But is there no such thing as moral purification? If a man is a sinner once must he always be a sinner, and an unforgiven sinner? We have all had conscience after us. Or do you tell me that all the words of your life have been just right, and all the thoughts of your heart have been just right, and all the actions of your life just right? Then you do not know yourself, and I take the responsibility of saying you are a pharisee, you are a hypocrite, you are a Pontius Pilate and do not know it. You commit the very same sin that Pilate committed. You have crucified the Lord of Glory. But if nineteenths of this audience are made up of thoughtful and earnest people, then nineteenths of this audience are saying within themselves, "Is there no such thing as moral purification? Is there no laver in which the soul may wash and be clean?" Yes, yes, yes. Tell it in song, tell it in sermon, tell it in prayer, tell it to the hemispheres. That was what David cried out for when he said "Wash me throughly from my sin, and cleanse me from mine iniquities." And that what in another place, he cried out for when he said, "Wash me and I shall be whiter than snow." Behold, the laver of the gospel, filled with living fountains. Did you ever see the picture of the laver in the ancient tabernacle or in the ancient temple? The laver in the ancient tabernacle was made out of the women's metallic looking-glasses. It was a great basin, standing on a beautiful pedestal; but when the temple was built, then the laver was an immense thing called the brazen sea; and oh, how deep were the floods there gathered! And there were ten lavers beside—five at the right and five at the left—and each laver had three hundred gallons of water. And the outside of these lavers was carved and engraved with palm trees so delicately cut you could almost see the leaves tremble, and so true to life that you could imagine you saw the nostril throb, and the cherubim with outspread wings. That magnificent laver of the old dispensation is a feeble type of the more glorious laver of our dispensation, our sunlit dispensation.

Here is the laver holding rivers of salvation, having for its pedestal the Rock of Ages carved with the figure of the lion of Judah's tribe, and having palm branches of victory, and wings suggestive of the soul's flight toward God in prayer, and the soul's flight heavenward when we die. Come to the laver of victory, and wash away all your sins of power aggravated, and all your sorrows, of power agonizing. Come to this fountain, for all sin and uncleanness, the furthest, the worst. You need not carry your sins half a second. Come and wash in this fountain of Gospel laver. Why, that is an opportunity enough to swallow up all nations. That is an opportunity that will yet stand on the Alps and beckon to Italy, and yet stand on the Pyrenees and beckon to Spain, and will yet stand on the Ural and beckon to Russia, and it will stand at the gate of heaven and beckon to all nations. Pardon for all sin, and pardon right away, through the blood of the Son of God. A little child that had been blind, but through skilful surgery brought to sight, said: "Why, mother, why didn't you tell me the earth and sky are so beautiful? Why didn't you tell me?" "Oh," replied the mother, "my child, I did tell you often; I often told you how beautiful they are; but you were blind, and you couldn't see!" Oh, if we could have our eyes opened to see the glories in Jesus Christ we would feel that the half had not been told us, and you would go to some Christian man and say, "Why didn't you tell me before of the glories in the Lord Jesus Christ?" and that friend would say, "I did tell you, but you were blind and could not see, and you were deaf and could not hear."

History says that a great army came to capture ancient Jerusalem, and when this army got on the hills so that they saw the turrets and the towers of Jerusalem, they gave a shout that made the earth tremble; and tradition, whether true or false, says that, so great was the shout, eagles flying in the air dropped under the atmospheric percussion. Oh, if we could only catch a glimpse of the towers of this Gospel temple into which you are all invited to come and wash, there would be a song jubilant and wide-resounding, at New Jerusalem seen, at New Jerusalem taken, the hosannas of other worlds flying mid-air would fold their wings and drop into our closing doxology! Against the disappointing and insufficient laver of Pilate's vice, and Pilate's cowardice, and Pilate's sin, I place the brazen sea of a Saviour's pardoning mercy!

THE VALLEY OF REPHAIM.

At a recent meeting of the Academie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, in Paris, M. Dieulafoy, the well-known explorer in the East, read a most interesting account of his visit to the scene of the decisive encounter between King David and the Philistines in the Valley of Rephaim. After the capture of Jerusalem by David and the establishment of the Israelite Monarchy, the Philistines resolved to crush the nascent kingdom, and, after alternations of success and failure, they occupied the Valley of Rephaim, situated at the foot of the slopes which led from the west to Jerusalem. It was then that David, constantly attacked by his enemies, executed one of the finest military manœuvers recorded in history. M. Dieulafoy, while indicating the various advances made by military art, and having shown that before the wars of the Medes no nation had any acquaintance with the rules of higher tactics and strategy, dwelt upon the fact that David was the first of the Israelite leaders to form drilled and disciplined troops, and pointed out what good use the King made of this army in the Valley of Rephaim. The plan of the battle, very clearly described in the Bible (which ascribes the direction of it to Jehovah), comprised a flank march, a rapid change of front, the rapid encompassing of the left wing of the Philistines, and an attack from behind on this wing. This was a complicated and bold turning movement, very difficult to execute, and something quite out of the common for the age in which it was carried out. M. Dieulafoy, who had discovered the theatre of operations and had made use of the general topography of the reign in order to reconstitute the principal phases of the battle, pointed out that this movement presented a striking analogy with those executed by Frederick II. at the battle of Mollwitz and Rossbach, and by Napoleon at Austerlitz. In the conduct of this operation, David gave evidence of the highest capacities, taking advantage of all the inequalities of the ground, forming his troops afresh in the wood, and charging impetuously, and M. Dieulafoy insisted very strongly upon the similarity of his military genius to that of Napoleon.

A WONDERFUL GOBLET.

Rev. Dr. Guthrie delighted to relate a story of a wonderful goblet which the genius of a heathen fashioned, teaching a moral which many a deathbed has fearfully illustrated: "Having made the model of a serpent, he fixed it in the bottom of the cup; and there, with eyes gleaming in its head, and fangs raised to strike, it lay, coiled for the spring. Beneath the ruby wine, the cup is raised, the draught is quaffed, the dregs are reached, and now that dreadful head rises up, too late to warn. And so, when pleasure's cup is nearly emptied, and the sinner with unwilling lips is draining its bitter dregs, shall rise the ghastly terrors of remorse, and death, and judgment, on his despairing soul. A serpent lurks at the bottom of guilt's sweetest pleasure."

A GIRL MISSIONARY IN JAPAN.

Roughing it on a Japanese Steamer—A Night on Deck—Difficulties of Christian Work in Japan.

AMONG the devoted ladies who have gone out to Japan to carry the Gospel to their Japanese sisters is Miss Nina McClanaghan who is working under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society. She is a graduate of the Royal University, Dublin, where she won high honors. Her portrait in the Academical robes appears on this page. It was a great surprise to the brilliant circle which she adorned in the Irish capital, when she declared her intention of giving her life to the service of Christ as a missionary, but she was not to be turned from her purpose, and she is now doing successful work in Japan. Following are some extracts from one of her recent letters describing her journey from Osaka to her field of labor at Hamada:

"As you are aware, the Church Missionary Society has assigned me to Hamada, a seaside town in South Western Japan, where I am to labor in connection with Miss Fugill's mission. I have just arrived and I thought I would busy myself in writing you an account of my voyage.

"I left Osaka at about four o'clock P.M., on Friday, in a steamer about half the size of a North Wall and Holyhead boat. With me, I had a particularly nice Japanese girl, named Nishino Sau, who is to be my teacher and Bible woman till the summer. I want you to couple her name with mine in your prayers, for I feel sure the Master means us to be a blessing to one another, and together to help others.

"Now, dear friends, come along and see my ship—S. S. 'Chinzei Maru.' 'It's a thrifle unaisy gettin' aboord,' as an old woman, that I know in the dearest of all lands, would say, but now that you are on board, just take a look at that kind of book-shelf with very wide shelves, where the third-class passengers are stowed away layer over layer. How would you like to go a three and a half days' voyage like that through dreadful seasons? I have seen a Japanese mother after she has done so with a wee baby and three tiny children, and she was just as gentle, just as thoughtful and unselfish with her children at the end, as any of us are, under the happiest circumstances. I wish I were more like her.

"There are only two classes on board the 'Chinzei Maru,' but after that glimpse our arrangements appear almost palatial. Cabins there are none. The second saloon is, I think, about twenty feet by twelve or fifteen feet. On Saturday night twenty-three of us had only just room to lie side by side in it, allowing extra space for a little wall of luggage, which my girl and I placed between us and the other passengers. Don't be horrified, my friends. This is excess of elegance and comfort to heaps of things which many of your itinerating missionaries have to put up with during their journeyings even in civilized Japan.

"I draw a veil over the good-byes to the numbers of people who came to see us off. To me it was almost like leaving home a second time, and I don't think my companion felt it less deeply. It is too cold to stay on deck, so we go below, and just as we get straight, a Japanese meal is served. We have a liberal supply of foreign food, but just now we are feeling very well, and would like to live like the rest, so we sit down, too, and very nice it all is with the exception of the 'daikon,' a sort of radish turnip, which must not be eaten till it's beginning to decay. This I have not yet learned to like. All the rest is very nice—cockle soup with cockles, and shells, and all there; fish served with ginger, some green vegetables like boiled cress, and the never-failing rice—all served in the dainty Japanese way, each in a tiny bowl and placed on a little lacquer table before each person. Of course, as a foreigner, I attract a great deal of attention, though gracefully concealed in anxiety as to whether I have enough rice. I am nervously apprehensive that if I do not handle my chop-sticks more dexterously there is danger of bringing disgrace on our boasted civilization. The night is beautifully calm, so we lie down in our ulsters with warm rugs and shawls. The little dais at the end of the saloon which we share with three other persons, is covered with carpet in addition to the thick matting, which is all over the floor; but still the luxurious foreigner finding it rather inclined to make one's bones work their way through, and the unfortunate tall people finding the position rather cramped, wake up many times through the night, and divide their attention between the neighboring port-hole (showing the beautiful hills round the Inland Sea, lit up by the ghostly moonlight), and the weird lines of human beings with their still white faces turned up from their wooden pillows.

"Well to return—Saturday saw nothing remarkable except that as I sat on deck writing to mother, I generally had an admiring crowd watching each word as I wrote, exclaiming, 'Ah, how curious!' All Saturday we passed through beautiful scenery—the Inland Sea especially beautiful now, I think, when the highest of the surrounding hills are capped with snow, and the lights are most lovely. All Saturday the wind grew and grew. When I got too cold to stay longer on deck, I busied myself knitting or studying, or writing down below, to the great admiration of a kind farmer-like man, who seemed to be of the Christian Scientist type. He did his best to comfort all who were ill by assuring them that 'it was all nervousness, nothing but nervousness. It had nothing to do with the body, but all came from the spirit, and if only they could keep a brave heart, they would be all right.' Dear kind man, as the hurricane grew, even he relapsed into painful and ominous silence, and I did not hear him say another word during all the voyage. I tried to keep up a brave heart, but later on in the evening, I was painfully changing my position, when a voice from the floor called out half pityingly, half triumphantly, 'Even the English lady is ill.' It was the last straw, and the camel collapsed most utterly. I draw a veil over the remainder of that day of suffering. It was not until eleven o'clock on Monday night that we reached Hamada.

"We are now staying in a hotel kept by a Christian widow. The Society has taken a Japanese house for us, and as soon as a few alterations can be made, we hope to move in. The pastor and his wife called this afternoon. Nishino Sau was splendid, getting Japanese tea, cakes, etc. I took my share in the Japanese conversation for about one and a half hours, and oh, such Japanese mine was, too. I am glad no unfriendly critics were near.

"One thing more—many of you will, I know, be praying much for us, just at this time. Hamada is not by any means a flowery field. Some Christians here have brought disgrace on the name of their Master and on his holy religion, so that it will be up-hill work at first. There are only six Christians here now, so that our household, Miss Fugill and myself, our Bible woman and two Christian helpers—will just double the church. Do not pray that we may be successful, do not pray that we may be wise, do not pray that we may be clever with the language—God only knows how much we need all these things—but pray this one prayer and all else will follow. Pray that we may be all that is meant by 'members of Christ'—without any life or energy or power and will of our own, save that which comes moment by moment from our Divine Head, as completely at his disposal, and under his control as my right hand is under that of my head or brain."

JESUS BEFORE PILATE.

S. S. Lesson for May 19. Mark 15: 1-13. Golden Text Mark 15: 5. By Mrs. Baxter.

BEFORE Christ could be manifested as God's one and unchangeable High-Priest, the Levitical priesthood had to sum up the measure of its iniquity in the person of Caiaphas, who took upon himself to condemn his Lord. The divine is founded upon the ruins of the human. Having done all they could to work his destruction, the priests held a consultation with the elders and scribes and the whole council, all gathered together against him who did not resist evil. They bound him, who was bound in spirit already, and who had been a yielded offering from the moment of his coming into the world (Heb, 10: 5); and they carried him away, and delivered him to Pilate. Now it was Pilate's turn to be put to the proof whether he would also Refuse to Know God's Christ.

The priests and rulers had waxed bolder in collecting and assorting evidence against Jesus. "They began to accuse him, saying: We found this Man perverting our nation and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that Himself is Christ, a King." (Luke 23: 2.) The story of the tribute money must have arisen from the words with which he had silenced the Pharisees and the Herodians: "Render to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things which are God's." (Matt. 22: 21.) The accusers of Jesus neither sought for, nor wished to know, the truth; their only object was to get rid of Jesus at any cost. Pilate was not alarmed at the pretended danger that Jesus should raise a revolution against Cæsar. He asked him: "Art thou the King of the Jews?" To which Jesus answered: "Thou sayest" (Luke 23: 3), i. e., yes. But this answer, far from convincing the unprejudiced Pilate that Jesus was dangerous to the government, only elicited from him the remark: "I find no fault in this Man."

The case was going against them, and they saw it could not stand on its own merits. Pilate knew the inoffensive character of the great Teacher and Physician in Jerusalem, and these accusers must go wider afield if they were to substantiate a charge against Jesus. They sought, as many do now, to make up in vehemence and invective for what they lacked in truth. "They were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching through all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place." The mention of Galilee was a great relief to Pilate. He had enough experience of criminal cases to discern that the Man before him was innocent, but that the heads of the Jewish people were jealous of him, and bent on his destruction, and that, if he were to oppose them, he would become unpopular, and perhaps might lose his post if they accused him to Cæsar. Pilate had enough conscience to be clear what his duty was as an impartial judge. Would he have courage to do the right? All flesh is grass . . . the grass withereth. Mankind had failed God; he chose the Jews—the Jews had failed him, He sent his Son—the priests and rulers rejected him; and the Gentile Governor, Pilate, had an opportunity given him to vindicate him which few men have. Would he fail also? Pilate was glad to be rid of the responsibility, and so he sent Jesus to Herod. It was his First False Step.

He thought to have washed his hands of him. But no; no man can ever do that. Christ has to do with every individual man's sin, and shame, and death, and no man can escape, at some time or other, a personal and decisive meeting with Jesus.

Herod was glad of the opportunity to see Jesus, of whom he had heard much; he hoped to gratify his carnal curiosity in seeing some miracle done by him. But he miscalculated. Jesus was not at the beck and call of any earthly power, but under the immediate direction, moment by moment, of his Father. Herod could not understand a man who had power to work miracles, unwilling to manifest his power before royalty. The king then questioned him, while the chief priest and scribes stood and vehemently accused him, and he answered not a word. This was the more strange to Herod. Here was a man unjustly accused, who seemed utterly indifferent as to whether the sentence went against him or not, and who made no use whatever of the presence of the king. Perhaps Herod had never felt so small in the presence of any other man. But he was angry and mortified; provoked with the silence of the Accused. So he had recourse to brutality, and he and his men of war set at naught the Son of God, arrayed him in mockery with a gorgeous robe and sent him again to Pilate.

And Pilate must give sentence. He had sought to shift the responsibility, but he could not. And we cannot, either. Every day, every hour of the life of each one of us pronounces sentence for or against the Lord Jesus Christ; every one of us is a continual witness for or against our Lord. Pilate, addressing the accusers and witnesses, declared: "Ye have brought this Man unto me as one that perverteth the people; and behold I, having examined him before you, have found touching those things whereof ye accuse him. No, nor yet Herod; for I sent you to him; and lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto him." The Son of Man has stood before three tribunals, without one witness on his side, with all the influence of priests and rulers against him; he had made no defence whatever, and now the summing up of the evidence is: "There is no fault in him!" And yet the Jews demanded that he should be slain!

There are few men now who will not condemn sin, who will not allow the vanity of the world and the unsatisfactory nature of things earthly, there are few, unless they are the fools who say: "No God" (Ps. 50: 3), that do not desire, at some time or other, to turn to God. But when they are brought to the point, they cannot summon up courage to make the stand, and turn with all their heart to the God who made, and the Saviour who redeemed them. Pilate was one of these. He had pronounced Jesus to be innocent of all the charges brought against him, and yet he said: "I will therefore chastise him and release him" (Luke 23: 16). Why chastise an innocent man? Only to please the Jews, while he would save his own conscience in saving Jesus from capital punishment.

But those half measures did not answer. Somebody must take the responsibility of bringing the Holy One of God to the Cross, and it lay with Pilate to speak the first word, and Pilate was the responsible party. Like Caiaphas and Herod, he appealed to his prisoner to answer the charges against him. "And he gave him no answer, not even to one word; insomuch that the governor marvelled greatly" (Matt. 27: 14, R. V.). Another way of escape from his dilemma presented itself to Pilate. It was the custom at the feast that one prisoner should be set free, and he determined that it should be Jesus. One other man was in ward, a man dangerous to society, a robber, and a murderer, the greatest contrast to him who went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed of the devil. With strong hopes that the multitude would choose Jesus, the governor gave them the choice which should be released. And to his consternation, the people, persuaded by the chief priests and rulers, chose Barabbas!

To add to his mental conflict, Pilate's wife sent unto him, saying, "Have thou nothing to do with that just Man, for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him." Everything was ordered of God to concur in convincing him that Jesus was true, but it seemed to him that to follow his convictions meant ruin and disgrace. And he had not the manliness to do the right thing at any cost. There was a pitiable weakness in his appeal to the people: "What then shall I do with Jesus which is called Christ?" What should he do with a man whom he declared innocent? There was but one right course, to set him free: but Pilate dared not take it. Yet the Spirit of God strove mightily with him.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

"I FIND NO FAULT IN THIS MAN."

PILATE was the Procurator, or representative, of the Roman Emperor in Judæa. From Roman history we learn that he was appointed in A.D. 26, and governed the country for ten years. His administration appears to have been cruel and corrupt. It must have been very galling to the proud Sanhedrim to have to ask such a man's permission to execute their sentence. But that was one of the humiliating consequences of being a subject nation. The priests affected to treat the matter as a mere formality, and sent Jesus into Pilate's court to be condemned, and did not even enter themselves. But Pilate was too well versed in Roman procedure to become merely a machine for ratifying the edicts of a Jewish court. He went out to them and inquired the nature of the charge. The haughty priests resented the inquiry, and intimated that Jesus had already been judged and condemned. If he was not an evil-doer, they would not have brought him there. Pilate meets them on their own ground, and cannot refrain from a covert taunt. As they are too proud to make a specific charge, they may deal with the matter themselves. Being thus forced to enter into detail, they encounter a difficulty. Jesus had been condemned for blasphemy, and no Roman judge would recognize that as a capital crime. To obtain sentence from Pilate, there must be a new charge, and they make it treason. This man claimed to be a king. Pilate went back into court to examine the prisoner. It did not take long to satisfy Pilate that this quiet, meek prisoner was no dangerous conspirator against Cæsar. It would be absurd to put a man to death for rebellion who distinctly repudiated an appeal to force. Hoping to evade responsibility, Pilate avails himself of a reference to Galilee to regard Jesus as a subject of Herod, and sends him to that king, who is on a visit to Jerusalem. But the man who had killed John the Baptist was little likely to interfere. He treats the charge as a joke, and carries it further by clothing the prisoner in mock-royal robes and sending him back. Pilate is thus compelled to deal with the case, and if he had been led by his duty and his inclinations, he would have refused to grant the ratification of the sentence. But he was in a difficulty. He was afraid to offend the priests, as they might make trouble at Rome and cause him to be recalled. On this case they could do him no mischief. The Emperor and public opinion would have approved him for refusing to condemn an innocent man. But Pilate's record was not clean, and he was aware that if the priests became his enemies, they might complain to the Emperor of his conduct in other matters, which would not so well bear investigation. He, therefore, tried to avoid offending the pr ts, and yet to save the prisoner's life. ss- pecting that jealousy and superstitio av at the root of the accusation, Pilate ap ed to the people. He was in the habit of s w- ing respect for the feast by an act of m- ency, and he suggests that he shall r se Jesus. But the people, led away b e priests, and perhaps irritated with s, who had taken no steps after the t m- phant entry to assert himself, but se ed to be a poor, weak, tame creature, un er the kingship claimed for him, demand the release of Barabbas, who was really i ts of sedition. Foiled again, Pilate ma n- other plea for Jesus, and then th ea charge is explained to him. The pr e- had said he was the Son of God. ate seems to have been alarmed, and h n- easiness was increased by his wife's e, which was brought to him at that jun re. He is more than ever disposed to refu e consent to the execution. But a e threat brings him to terms. The Jew that if he lets Jesus go, he is not Ca friend. That means that if he does what they want, they will denounce Rome. What was the life of one co Jew to Pilate in comparison with the his position? He yields; but he is so indignant at being forced to do a thi does not approve. He takes wate washes his hands before them, dec himself innocent of the crime they about to commit. It was an empty mony, a boyish action. Pilate could that way evade responsibility. Even tus, an historian of his own nation, f on him. About seventy years later he "Christ was put to death by Pilate.

Art thou the King? The questio asked in derision, but multitudes nov Jesus for their King. No monarch h many subjects as he, and none ha jects who are so devotedly loyal. A Melville told King James VI. of Sco that there was no contention abo royalty of the kingdom. "There ar kings and two kingdoms in Scotlan told the Stuart monarch. "There is James, the head of the Commonw and there is King Jesus, whose s King James is—and in that Kingdom is not a king, nor a Lord, nor a hea a subject."

What evil hath he done? This was pro the only time when such a question be asked without someone being a furnish an instance of wrongdoing. ever blameless a life may have bee sure to have contained some evil. but Christ could give the challenge convinceth me of sin? Some lives been sorely embittered at the close knowledge of evil that can never called, but will go on perpetually doi mischievous work. When toward the his life Robert Burns called on Mrs. F he told her he was convinced he wou live long, and added that he grieved b as he thought of the mischievous line he could not suppress, but would co to be published even after his death. were lines never intended for the eye, but written to friends and read miliar company and remembered. H he would give anything if he coul them out of existence.

Rather release Barabbas. Two f walking home after a service at wh sermon on the trial of Christ had preached, were talking of this incid Barabbas. "I think it almost increc said one. "There seems to have popular vote of professedly religious and they deliberately voted for a thi murderer in preference to a public be tor. What madness it was!" The said: "The world generally account decision sane and the opposite one ness. I know a case in point. A man, who is the son of a wealthy and distiller in London was con and began to visit among the poor speak at missions and to visit the jail found his father's liquor sold in all t loons of the poorest districts in Londo soon learned that drink was the cause of murder, theft and all ki crime. When he came of age his fath posed, to make him a partner in the ness. He might soon have been a m aire with a seat in Parliament. But fused and renounced all part or profit business preferring poverty to any sh the responsibility. You will find ple people who call him a fool and not think he must be demented. Yet all was to prefer Christ to the business is the modern Barabbas."

FOR AN OUT-DOOR GOSPEL.

T: Open-Air Workers' Association of America, and its Labors for the Unevangelized Masses in our Towns and Cities.

HE formation of the Open-Air Workers' Association of America, in the Spring of 1893, was the natural outcome of the growing popularity of this form of Christian activity. That organization was fortunate in choosing a board of officers, who were not only capable men, but also men to whom the Christian public had already given its confidence and esteem. Rev. R. A. Torrey, the head of Mr. Moody's Bible Institute of Chicago, was elected President, the Vice-Presidents being Rev. A. J. Gordon, Commander Ballington Booth, Rev. Teunis S. Hamlin, D.D., Rev. Josiah Strong, D.D., Rev. James H. Brooks, D.D., Rev. H. L. Hastings and Hon. W. H. Howland of Toronto, Can. On the Executive committee were Dr. G. LeLacheur, Superintendent of the Brooklyn City Mission and Tract Society, Rev. A.C. Dixon, D.D., Rev. Dr. Stone of the Washington Square M.E. Church of New York City, Rev. J.C.Collins, Secretary of the Christian Workers, while two of Brooklyn's young business men, Frank H. Marston and James H. Prentice filled the positions of Secretary and Treasurer.

During the first year, the membership of the association extended into twenty-one States and provinces, and its first annual report gave an interesting account of the work of its members. One of its most wide-awake members is H. B. Gibbud of Syracuse, whose work is already well-known to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and whose Gospel Wagon has scattered the good seed far and wide. In one of our illustrations on this page is represented a service in the Market Square of Syracuse, where all sorts and conditions of people flock to hear the preaching and singing in a way that would startle the staid pastors and the elegant ushers of some good fashionable churches. They gather close about the wagon; no empty front seats staring the preacher in the face, no sleepy hearers falling off into a comfortable doze. A "baby organ" leads the singing, while a chorus of voices from the wagon ring out "the old, old story." Not only does the wagon bring the workers here and supply them with pulpit and choir-loft, but it enables them when the meeting is ended, to roll along to another section of the city and there repeat the service.

Last summer Mr. Gibbud took his wagon to the hop fields in New York State and during their busy season did a grand work. Every one of his open-air services in the city was a story of Zaccheus was repeated in a modernized form. A lineman, perched on a telegraph pole, heard the testimonies, was convicted of sin, the next day came to the workers and was led to the Saviour.

One of the first, perhaps the first, and certainly one of the most successful Gospel Wagons in America, is the one owned by the Central Union Mission of Washington, D.C. Hundreds of converts date their first interest to the proclamations from this chariot of the Lord. As a means of awakening the careless and arousing the indifferent, this is accounted the best agency of the Mission. Most of its many branches have sprung from these Gospel Wagon services, at which many eminent clergymen and Christian laymen of that city not infrequently assist.

In view of their interest and success in open-air work in Washington, it was not surprising that the third annual Convention of the Open-Air Workers' Association of America should assemble in that city. It was held on May 6th and 7th and was a notable gathering. Their programme contained the following: Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, D.D., gave the address of the convention on Monday evening. On Tuesday morning the Association conducted its business meeting; in the afternoon Judge I. G. Kimball of Washington read a paper on the "Legal Rights of Christians to Proclaim the Gospel in Public Thoroughfares and Parks." Never had this latter subject been treated from the broad, legal standpoint, and it proved of very great value and interest to open-air workers all over the land. The convention discussed various methods of working, speakers from Cleveland, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Brooklyn participating.

The membership of the association consists of men and women who have accepted the Lord Jesus Christ as a Saviour and are engaged or interested in presenting him as such in the open air. There are three classes of members—active, those actively engaged in open-air work and contributing annually to the association one dollar; associate, those interested in the work and contributing two dollars annually; sustaining, those of either of the two preceding classes who contribute five dollars annually. The members of this association are not dependent on wheels and horses. A chair, a keg, a curb-stone gives them all the advantage they ask, and answers well for a pulpit. They take their stand in the street beside tenement houses, on the beach of a summer resort, on the docks. Wherever non-churchgoers are found, there go these workers. An instance is found in the usual Sunday afternoon dock meeting of the Life-Line Mission of Brooklyn. As is customary with many workers at the close of the services, all are invited to accompany the speakers from the docks to the Mission rooms. Those who have been impressed usually do so, and thus an opportunity for personal conversation is given. Many have found Christ through these dock meetings.

Equally successful have been the tent meetings, to encourage which is also the scope of this association. Special opportunities are afforded in the suburbs and near the parts of our great cities, where the people go forth for a walk in the pure air. These are easily attracted to a seat in the shade, and become attentive hearers. To encourage all services of this sort is the aim of the association and its workers. It believes in Christ's command to go out into the highways and hedges, with the good news.

The association has just issued its report for this year, beautifully illustrated, and a copy will be forwarded to anyone sending to the Secretary, 21 Water Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

THREE PRICELESS BIBLES.

Doubtless the three most precious Bibles in the world, in a purely commercial sense, are those in the British Museum, the National Library in Paris, and the cloister of Belem, near Lisbon. The first is manuscript, written by Alcuin and his pupils, and in the year 800 was presented to Charlemagne on the day of his coronation. Early in the present century it was in the possession of a private gentleman in Basle, who offered it to the French Government for forty-two thousand francs. Afterwards it was sold to the British Museum for the comparatively small sum of £750. The book is written in fine, small characters, and is decorated throughout with exquisite vignettes and arabesques. The chapter headings, as also the name of Jesus, are everywhere written in gold. The Paris Bible was published in 1527, printed by order of Cardinal Ximenes, and dedicated to Leo X. One of the three copies, printed on vellum paper, was, in 1789, sold to England for 12,000 francs. This copy was afterwards presented to Louis Philippe, and in this way was placed in the National Library. The third, or Belem Bible, consists of nine folio volumes, and is written on parchment. It was stolen by Junot in 1807, and taken to Paris. Madame Junot, when Portugal wanted to buy the Bible back, asked 150,000 francs for it. Louis XVIII., however, made the Portuguese Government a present of the precious volume.

THO' YOUR SINS BE LIKE CRIMSON.

Isa. 1: 18.

SAITH the Lord, "Come now and reason,"
Take salvation free and full,
And your sins tho' red like crimson,
Shall become as white as wool.

Though your sins be red like crimson,
Tho' like scarlet they shall glow,
White as wool my blood will make them,
"White as wool" and "white as snow."

Though your sins be red like crimson,
I will cleanse you from all sin—
Take away your heart so "stony,"
"Put an heart of flesh" within.

Though your sins be red like crimson,
They are blotted from my sight,
And your soul no longer captive
Comes from darkness into light.

Pitcairn's Wondrous Story.

thenceforth became the permanent home of almost all the families from Pitcairn. Every kindness was showered upon them and their new abode was divided into homesteads for their use. Trades teachers were sent to train the young men, and schoolmasters and missionaries to lead them in the paths of educatiion and religion. A few families returned to Pitcairn Island, but the majority remained and prospered in the new settlement.

Some of the descendants of the "Bounty" mutineers are now being trained for missionary work in Melanesia and a few, some years ago, entered the Gospel field, having been ordained by Rt. Rev. J. C. Patteson, the first bishop of Melanesia. One (Fisher Young) fell a victim to the savage natives on Santa Cruz island in 1864, and the Bishop himself became a martyr in a murderous assault on one of the islands in 1871.

In 1890—a century after the "Bounty" mutiny—the re-colonized island had again become populous. Missionaries were laboring among the people and the Gospel had made many conquests. Churches, schools and mission chapels were built, and the services were largely attended. A missionary ship, "The Pitcairn," made regular visits there and to other mission stations on the Pacific. The island—a twice-redeemed Eden—is now a frequent port of call for vessels. Many of its sons and daughters are bright ornaments in the field of Christian service. Thus the little community of castaways, which under God's favor grew up to strength and usefulness under the faithful leading of a redeemed sinner, John Adams, has become a source of inspiration and blessing to thousands scattered all over the islands of the great Pacific.

CONVERTED ON A LOCOMOTIVE.

With God nothing is impossible. His truth has come home to the hearts of men in unheard-of places and under most singular conditions. At sea, in the midst of tempest, on the battle-field while the bullets flew like hail, or in the quiet night watches, men have been led to Christ. A pastor relates the following incident in illustration of this: "An engineer recently told us the story of his conversion. He was on his engine and the train was running at the rate of forty miles an hour. He had been earnestly seeking the Lord for salvation, and, while engaged in his earthly vocation, his heart was toward God, in strong desire and earnest prayer. At a certain point in the route, suddenly, this promise of the Word was presented to his mind: "Though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson they shall be as wool." It was a voice from heaven to his soul. His heart fastened on the truth—he believed and was saved in an instant. It was joyous beyond description. We said to him, "Did you turn on more steam, and increase the speed of the train?" "No;" he said, "the train was going fast enough." "Well," we remarked, "your soul went into the kingdom of heaven far faster than the train was speeding."

SICK IN CHURCH.

THE best of men and women will sometimes sicken in a meeting-house. There will be something in the poor ventilation, or in the dullness and protractedness of the sermon, or the ill-health of the auditor, to make him faint. Let there be all sympathy and delicacy evinced in removing the patient to an adjoining room, and resuscitating him. If nothing better than selfishness influence, let us be attentive and helpful, since our turn to faint may come next. But one thing we protest against, and that is when a person faints in church, all the curious people go out to see what is the matter, and hinder the resuscitation by standing close around the sufferer when his or her chief want is not a gaping crowd, but fresh air. We were one Sabbath preaching in a village church in northern New York. Whether it was our sermon that sickened her, or the heat of the day, we never knew; but a young lady excited all our sympathies by getting faint. Her father and mother and sister and lover and the sexton went out with her, as it was proper for them to do. But in addition to that, an old lady sitting beside the pulpit, and whose characteristic was inquisitiveness, glided down the aisle. This started all the other old ladies, for it was uncertain now whether the old lady aforesaid had been taken sick herself, or whether she had gone out to minister to the first patient. The old ladies having departed, the old gentlemen felt as if it would be no more than gallant to go too, and so they joined in the procession. The middle-aged people in the congregation, seeing the elderly people go out, felt that it was mean to let the old people put themselves to so much trouble, while they, the middle-aged, sat indifferent, and therefore many of them, urged by this piece of circumstance, went out also. As the middle-aged men were departing, they met the old men coming in to get their hats, the latter promising in the aisle, in a low grumble of conversation, to rejoin the former on the green grass. By this time the children in the church had no one to look after them, and as some of them had never seen anybody faint, they went out on a tour of discovery, till we turned around in the pulpit to the minister behind us and suggested we go likewise. But as he protested, we tarried. We found out afterward the maiden was only a little sick, but that they crowded around her so closely that she had no chance at all, and so succumbed to nervousness. Let this be remembered, that six persons are all that at such times can be serviceable in the most urgent and painful case, and that beyond that the people who crowd around are a nuisance and a hindrance. After you find that enough have offered their services, better retire. There are inquisitive people who go to funerals, and go early, so that they can see the family take leave of the corpse, and that kind of people love to stand around a sick person, telling afterward how pale she looked, how her fingers clutched, and what words in her momentary dementation she uttered.

THE LONG REST.

NO nationality will better appreciate Heaven than Americans, for the most of them are nearly driven to death. Ever on the chase. Seated at the window of an express train going forty miles an hour, watch in hand, impatient that they cannot go sixty miles an hour. A foreign writer says: "Every American looks as if his eyes were glaring into the far West, and the far future." Another says: "The deepest-rooted cause of American disease is that overworking of the brain, and over-excitement of the nervous system, which are the necessary consequences of their intense activity; hence dyspepsia, consumption, insanity, and its brood of fell disorders in its train." For such people, I say, heaven will be a glorious relief, but I fear that some of them, even after they get there, will, from habit, be rushing about, wanting to see all the palaces the first hour, and call on all the patriarchs and apostles before they settle down to the first deliberate banquet; but with all eternity before them, they shall soon feel pervading them the sense of celestial quietude. What a world, into which the questions of livelihood never enter! They shall hunger no more, nor thirst any more.

While everlasting ages roll,
Eternal love shall feast their soul;
And scenes of bliss forever new,
Rise in succession to their view.

Oh, sweet employ, to sing and trace
The amazing depths and heights of Grace;
To spend, from sin and sorrow free,
A blisstul, vast eternity.

THE DAY-BREAK.

CHEER each other in all Christian endeavor. If any one has a discouragement about the work, let him hide it. If any one has a cheerful sign, let him display it. The glorious day of the world's evangelization advances, though somewhat slowly. The sun rises not by a sudden bound from the horizon to midheaven, but by gradual ascension. In this buoyant belief let us pray and work. When Alexander saw Diogenes sitting in the sun and warming himself, the conqueror asked the philosopher if there was anything he could do for him, and he said: "Yes, stand out of my sunshine, and do not take away that which you cannot give." As we sit in the warm light of the Gospel, and it gets brighter and brighter, do not let any one intercept his doubts and fears. If you cannot do anything else, stand out of our sunshine.

MOBOCRACY.

IF the ballot-box and Christian reform cannot correct public evils, and without bloodshed, then republican and democratic form of government is a dead failure. Bloodshed never corrected anything. What did the Forest-Macready riots accomplish years ago? They created a bitterness between foreign and domestic actors, which raged on for forty years. What did the railroad riots accomplish? The destruction of vast property and the loss of wages by a multitude of industrious employees. What have the mining riots accomplished? Price of coal put up for poor people, as well as the rich, and the starvation of the families of the miners. Labor strikes that carry a red flag strike with ten degrees of violence against monopolists, but strike with one hundred degrees of violence against honest industry. Perhaps after our statesmen and our philantropists have a little while longer experimented in trying to correct evils, the world may take the hint that we need God to come to the rescue. Oh, how much we need an importation of the supernatural into public affairs. If you can see any way out except through Divine interposition, then your eyesight is keener than mine. Society wants radical reconstruction. Secular education will not do it, for that gives force, without indicating whether it shall be for right or for wrong. Political parties will not do it. Availability of candidates for office is the dominant thought with them. Communism will not do. That knows how to destroy, but not to build. There is only one influence that proposes to annihilate everything bad, and uplift everything good, and that is Christianity; and after all else has proved its impotency, then this Divine Agency will accomplish the work. About the righting of all wrongs by Divine power, until there shall not be a thorn, or a disease, or an injustice, or a crime left, I have no scepticism. Forward, then, ye Christian workers in all departments of Christian service, your eyes unto the hills from whence cometh your help!

OUR MAIL-BAG.

M. E. B., Brunswick, Me. Why is the word "Magus" attached to the name of Simon?

To indicate his predilection for sorcery or magic. Simon Magus was a Samaritan living in the Apostolic age, and distinguished for his practice of magical arts.

N. C., Reader. Is it backsliders or infidels who are threatened in such passages as Heb. 6: 4-6; 10: 26, etc., where certain persons are apparently shut out from hope of pardon?

The description of the persons as having "tasted," having been "enlightened," indicates backsliders rather than infidels. The passages do not so much shut out hope of pardon as state a fact. If all that God has done in giving his Son has failed, there is nothing more that can be done. There might be a reason for failure in the ignorance of the people, but if a man has "tasted," and "received knowledge of the truth," and still rejects salvation, what hope can there be of him? He is not excluded, but excludes himself.

Wm. Dean, Indianapolis, Ind. How is it possible for the Godhead to consist of three Persons, and yet there be only one God?

Many profound minds have tried in vain to understand the doctrine of the Trinity. But a thing may be possible, although we cannot understand it. We cannot understand our own constitution. The brain, the mind and the soul are distinct, yet intimately connected, and they belong to one being. If a man of the last century had been told that messages might be sent by electricity, he might reasonably have asked sceptically, how it was possible; in the next life we may find that many mysteries have become plain, and the Trinity among them.

H. Wissner, Milwaukee, Wis. How are the 1,400,000,000 of the world's population distributed, as far as religious beliefs are concerned? If possible, give approximate figures.

According to the latest estimates, the total population of the globe was 1,424,000,000, of whom 687,750,000 were Buddhists, 196,000,000 Mohammedans, 6,000,000 Jews, 407,250,000 Christians, and 127,000,000 unclassified, the latter including a variety of heathen beliefs. But these figures are misleading, unless it is explained that Buddhism includes the Confucianism and Shintoism of China and Japan, the Grand Llama worship of Tibet, and various other forms, quite distinct from Buddhism, pure and simple.

J. T. Floyd, Eldorado, Kan. How many languages are spoken in the world to-day, and into how many of them has the Bible, or parts of it, been translated and printed?

The languages of the world are numbered by the hundreds, each great family or sub-division of the human race representing many different tongues and dialects. The Aryan family alone has thirty-nine living languages; the Semitic a large number, while the Hamitic, Southeastern Asiatic, Ural-Altaic, Dravidian, Malay-Polynesian, Caucasian, Central African, South African, and American divisions each has a considerable group peculiarly its own. Up to the present time portions of the Gospels have been translated and printed in over 300 different languages and dialects.

Reader, Eckhart, Mo. 1. Is the Apocrypha part of the Bible? 2. What is the difference between the Catholic Bible and Protestant Bible?

1. It is not so accepted. The books composing what are known as the "Apocryphal writings" of the Bible, being regarded as doubtful, both as to authenticity and authority. They were so regarded by the early Christian church, but it was not until the age of the Reformation that the term "Apocrypha" was applied to all but the canonical books of the Old Testament. 2. The Rhenish and Douay Bibles were vernacular versions designed by the Catholic Church to be an antidote to the free and liberal translation of the Scriptures in the Protestant Bibles. There are very material differences, too numerous to indicate here.

I. E. K., Attleboro, Mass. Does Christ's injunction about cutting off the right hand (Matt. 18: 8-9), require us to renounce the society of a dearly-loved friend at the town (ships is innocent but is liable to cause scandal?

There is no question of scandal raised by the passage. The question is one of personal responsibility between God and the soul. If a friendship involves temptation; if it ter to degrade the soul, turning it away from he spiritual to the sensual, then it comes ver the injunction of Christ. He held that spi al progress was the chief concern, and that wh- ever impeded it should be ruthlessly cut ay even if doing so involved suffering and lo s severe as would be the loss of a right ha Constant Reader, Scranton, Pa. Does not the r- ation of God as a God of love make the doc e of hell incredible?

Not in all its aspects. God has not - vealed definitely what kind of place the a e of the lost is, but merely that it is a pla f weeping, gnashing of teeth and intense su - ing, typified by burning. The idea is no consistent with what we know of sin here. e know the kind of a life a young man will l in his premature old age if he gives himse o vice in his youth. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A PERILOUS EXPEDITION.

ABLE dispatches in the daily press have reported at intervals during the past two weeks the perils and hardships of the expedition to Chitral. The region is so little known to the public that some fts about it may be useful. It is a moun- nous country lying on the north-west of lia and east of Afghanistan. The Hindu ksh mountains form its northern bound- , an almost impassable range, of which principal pass is twelve thousand feet ve the sea. Between Chitral and Pesh- r, the most advanced post in the Brit- possessions, there is a difficult country hundred miles wide, inhabited by war- tribes, who are believed to number, h the Chitral warriors, two hundred usand fighting men. These people are erpetual menace to British rule in India should they ever unite in a hostile at- k, especially if they had a Mohammedan der in whom they had confidence, there uld be a most sanguinary . Besides this danger, there he fact that should Russia de to reach out for India, she uld probably pour in her ps by that road. Sir ert Low rapidly collected an expedition urteen thousand men, including Sikhs, marched from Peshawur up the Swat ley to the rescue. He had to fight his y through the hostile country against a vastly superior in numbers and better uainted with the country. There were eral severe engagements, in one of which l. A Train on Fire.

A press dispatch from Sumter, S. C., describes the burning of a train on April 13, on the Manchester and Augusta railroad. The train consisted of fifteen cars laden with valuable merchandise and one tank car filled with kerosene. As the train passed Rimini, it was noticed that the oil was leaking along the track. A few miles farther there was an explosion and a great light shot up. Almost instantly the entire train was enveloped in flames. It was impossible to approach the cars near the tank car, as the oil on the track was ignited. The engine and the car next to it were detached and so were three cars at the rear, but the other eleven cars could not be reached and were entirely destroyed. It is supposed that some part of the running gear under the tank car must have broken and perforated the bottom of the tank, causing the leak. The loss is reported to be very heavy, as there was a great deal of valuable freight on the cars that were burned. It seems to have been a foolish thing to put a car of inflammable stuff among the others, but the arrangement was probably made with a view to the order of the destination of the various cars and the accident which might occur was not taken into account. There are some characters made up in the same way. We are often told that although a man is not a Christian, he is a good husband and father and does a great deal of good in charity, as if the one glaring defect could be compensated by admirable qualities. Like the precious freight on the train, the goodness of a man's character renders his loss all the more deplorable. (I. Cor. 3 : 13.)

A Chess-Player's Device.

An ingenious method of securing attention was adopted recently through a New York journal. A young man in England wrote to the paper stating that his father came to America three years ago. In writing to his family, whom he had left behind, he had omitted to give his address. They were very anxious to get into communication with him, and wanted the paper's assistance. As he had sent them several copies of it, they knew that he was in the habit of reading it. The young man had devised two chess problems, which he enclosed, and he thought that if they were published with his letter, they would attract his father's attention and lead to the removal of the difficulty in corresponding with him. The problems were duly published, and the end sought was accomplished. The father saw the problems, and his son's letter, and has sent his address to his anxious family. Another man's attention might have been caught by a paragraph about a scientific discovery, or some political event, but the son knew his predilections, and used the bait his father was fond of. It is much to be wished that such knowledge of a person's tastes was always put to as useful a purpose. It is often used for mischief, as when men are lured by their love of music, or of other innocent things, to places where the soul is wrecked. The enemy of souls is expert in such devices, but he never succeeds when all tastes and predilections are subservient to Christian principle and love of Christ. (II. Cor. 2 : 11.)

A Natural Stereotype.

A curious growth, resembling a metal process in common use, has been found in a swamp in Florida. A surveyor in Volusia County was employed recently by a Company to survey a holding which included a cypress swamp. The surveyor knew that the land must have been previously surveyed to mark the township boundaries. He could not, however, find any of the marks which the goverment surveyors always leave as mementos of their work. At the place where he would naturally expect to find such a mark, there stood a large cypress tree, which was evidently of considerable age. The surveyor examined it closely and clipped pieces off it. Under one of the pieces were the missing marks, indicating the number of section, range and township and the date, 1834. During the sixty-one years that have passed since the marks were blazed on the tree, the bark had grown over them, filling them so completely, that on the inner side of the piece that had been clipped off, were the raised letters and figures corresponding to the indentations in the tree, as a stereotype corresponds with the matrix. The passage of years sometimes has a similar effect on human beings. In middle life and old age the man does not show the marks which in his youth indicated his belonging to Christ's kingdom. He has become encrusted with worldliness and the effects of bodily indulgence. Well is it for such a man if God in his mercy, by some severe trial, strips him of his accretion and once more makes him a monument of his grace. (Ps. 119 : 67.)

An Island's Movement.

A press dispatch from Watch Hill, R. I., reports an astonishing natural phenomenon which indicates the approach of the time when Block Island will cease to deserve its name. It is based on the observation of a scientist who spends his winters on the island, and has just returned to the mainland. During the winter he measured with his instruments the force of the gales, and found that not infrequently they blew sixty-five miles an hour. Even when they did not attain that prodigious speed, they were hard and furious. During the gales the combined force of wind and water cuts great masses of clay from the southeastern corner of the island, digging far into the cliffs and forcing out huge cores of earth and stones. The overhanging bluffs fall when they are thus undermined, and the outline of the island is changed from year to year. The force of the current carries the detached masses around the coast to the northwestern end of the island, where they strike a long sandy spit, stretching toward the mainland, and are held fast. Every year the spit lengthens, and its mass increases by the accretions brought to it by the current. It cannot be long, thinks the scientist, before the spit reaches the mainland and forms an isthmus, turning the island into a peninsula. The storms of life may have an analogous effect on character. There are some aged Christians who no longer present to the world the bold front that they did in their early manhood. The winds of adversity and the waves of trouble and bereavement have shorn them of their power and beauty, but their spiritual nature has gained as their physical strength declined, until they seem to have, even before they die, a connection with the heavenly land, and to belong to it rather than the world. (Heb. 11 : 13-16.)

BRIEF NOTES.

We are Anxious to Introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in a large number of homes where it is not yet taken. As our readers will see, its value will sympathize with this wish, and can help us in the effort, we make them an extraordinary offer. We will send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from now until Jan. 1, 1896—a period of eight months—for one dollar, to any person not previously a subscriber, and to any subscriber sending us such new name with the dollar, we will send, all express charges paid, any one of our three magnificent premiums, "The Pathway of Life," "From Manger to Throne," or "Gospel Hymns from One to Six Complete." A new name sent merely as a substitute for that of a subscriber whose term is about to expire, will not entitle the sender to the advantages of this offer. This opportunity is good only until May 15, 1895.

Friends of Jennie Smith of Mountain Lake Park, Md., will be glad to learn that an effort is being made to rescue her from the financial difficulties which, as stated some time ago in these columns, threatened to close the home where so many of the Lord's servants have found rest and recuperation. The plan adopted is to vest the ownership of the property in a joint stock company, in shares of ten dollars each. Miss Smith is to continue the management and undertakes to pay interest at six per cent., redeeming the shares at their face value as she is able to do so. The property is to constitute the security for the shares. Full particulars may be obtained from Rev. T. D. Richards, Boyd, Md.

The Moody and Sankey Meetings at Fort Worth, Tex., stirred the whole neighborhood. The great building in which they were held was crowded at the two meetings held each day. The evangelists arrived on April 17 and the meetings commenced the following day. The churches of the town heartily co-operated in the formation of the choir and other work.

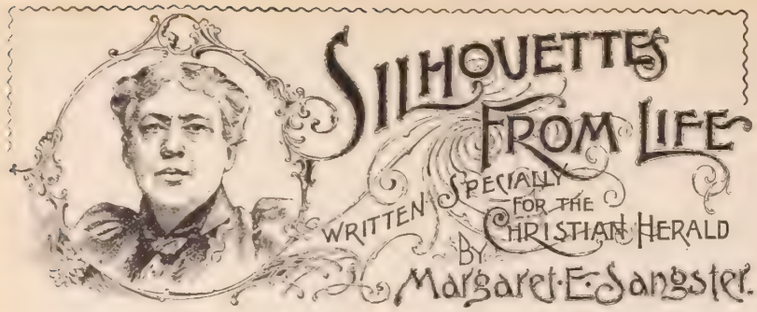
Rev. Thomas Harrison Has Been Conducting a very successful campaign at Millville, N. J. A local journal says that the services are the greatest ever held in that neighborhood. People attended from a great many towns, and it was necessary to have overflow meetings. Over six hundred seekers knelt at the altar during the progress of the services.

Evangelist Hartsough has been Holding union services in Forest City, Ia. The Methodist church, the largest in the place, was crowded each evening. The town was stirred to its centre, and the outlook of permanent results is hopeful. Fifty-eight persons signed consecration cards. Mr. Hartsough is taking a vacation of a few weeks, after which he will start out with his tent on his usual summer campaign.

Rev. Henry Varley, the English Evangelist, has been holding union meetings in Oakland, Cal. He organized a band of forty speakers, who would hold brief services on the street corners. The police, however, interfered and prohibited the meetings. A committee of about twenty ministers appealed to the mayor, but he said the council had passed an ordinance forbidding such gatherings and he must enforce it. He said he would favor the opening of the park in front of the City Hall for public meetings if the Council would pass a resolution.

Dr. H. Loomis, who is Laboring as a Missionary in Japan, has received from a Lieutenant of the Imperial Guard to whom he sent a New Testament, a letter in which the Lieutenant says: "I thank you for your kindness in sending me the Testament. I am exceedingly glad to have received a copy of the New Testament. Rest assured, I pray you, the Testament which you gave me I will carry to the field, and keep as a memorial of you. I enjoy reading the Scriptures, and shall be glad to receive any books pertaining to them."

A Great Bonfire was Built at Fultonville, N. Y., [illegible] services held there by Evangelist Geil, of Doylestown, Pa. One of the converts at the meetings was a saloon-keeper name Firth, whose place was one of the most notorious in the town. He determined after his conversion to quit the business. By his invitation the meeting adjourned to his saloon, and the entire stock, worth $600, was brought out and emptied into the gutter, and a bonfire was made of the barrels and fixtures. Mr. Geil preached from the top of an empty whiskey barrel to the crowd that assembled.



OVER YONDER.

ELIZABETH Lawrence was the most beautiful girl I ever knew. Tall and stately, with the swaying grace of a lily, and in her cheeks the faintest rose-flush, sometimes deepening, and sometimes paling, and her eyes like stars for depth and brightness. At nineteen, she was the loveliest human being who ever stepped out of a house-door and into the street, looking like a painter's dream taking on flesh and blood. Fair Elizabeth was one of a troop of beautiful sisters, all of whom died early.

Two of the Lawrence girls, Grace and Katherine, had grown to the fullness of exquisite womanhood, and, just a year apart, had drooped and faded, and been laid in the grave. Patty, a third, was an invalid, always weak and ailing, and carried from the mountains to the seashore, and back again, in the fruitless search for health. But Elizabeth never complained of an ache or pain, and never shrank from a single task, and at all gatherings of young people she was in great demand. Things passed off well, if Elizabeth Lawrence was there to engineer them, for she possessed beyond most women, the wonderful social art which brings the right people together, makes people appear at their best, and ensures a good time to all concerned.

When she became engaged to Maurice Lindsay, the whole village was delighted. It was as though Elizabeth belonged to us all and we were glad in her joy. The young men envied Maurice, the old men congratulated him, and the women hoped he was worthy of the sweet girl he had won. And we began to think what we would give her as a wedding present. Whoever else might be sparingly dowered with gifts, Elizabeth was sure to be showered with them, her path to be strewn with flowers, her bridal-day to be ushered in with every demonstration of good-will, and blessings prayed for in abundance. Everything promised so well. Why should a change come? But come it did, and soon.

My mother said to me as we walked home from a little neighborhood sociable one evening in June,

"I don't like that cough of Elizabeth's. It sounds like the one her sister Grace had, so short and hollow!"

"Why, I didn't notice that she coughed," I replied, "she never looked more brilliant than to-night. Her color came and went, and her hair was so becoming, dressed on top of her head, and then she looked so pretty in her white gown which was just a dream. I'm sorry if she has a cough. But it is probably only a trifling cold."

"I don't like it," Mother repeated gravely.

We were soon to find that Elizabeth's cough was no slight affair. It was the first flag of danger held out by nature against a fierce and insidious foe, a foe which old-fashioned people call galloping consumption. By September Elizabeth was wasted to a shadow, and on an early October morning, a fortnight before the day that would have been her wedding-day, she passed beyond our sight to the "green immortal land."

We watched her breathing through the night,
[illegible]
We [illegible]
Was heaving to and fro.

Just at dawn, a flicker of strength came to her! She asked to be lifted higher on her pillows! Her face shone with a glory of light, as if it were only a transparency for her soul. Never can I forget the unspeakable beauty of her eyes, of her last triumphant, surprised, absolutely ineffable expression of rapture.

"I see my sisters beckoning to me!" she exclaimed in tones low but clear, "but," with the light aflame in her eyes, "My Saviour first!"

A sigh, a faint flutter, and she was gone. Elizabeth was a saint in Paradise.

"My Saviour first!"

Often and often since then have I caught that miraculous ecstasy in the last look of the dying. Often have I heard them speak of what they saw, what was revealed to them in that supreme moment of the going hence to the life over yonder. A bride, not a month married, was called away by that mystical summons which we name Death, and saw, standing visibly before her, one like unto the Son of Man. Very suddenly had the disease which laid low her strength appeared and run its course. The wedding journey was not yet finished.

It would be very much worse, if it were you, John," she said to her young husband, "with the church just built, and the people so fond of you, and I see, I see so plainly, Jesus, and mother, and little Rob on the bank of the river, over there! They look so glad that I am coming! It will be only a little while, darling!" And she was called away.

"What will Jesus say when he sees me coming?" asked a dear little child, a son of the beloved Dr. Cuyler, one who many years ago slipped from the home nest into the warmth and cheer of heaven.

What will he say? We do not quite know, but he did say, "In my Father's house are many mansions. If it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you;" and best and dearest word of all, "I will come again, and receive you unto myself."

As Stephen gazing into heaven beheld him there, so thousands of his people see him at the last, and in that glimpse, we cannot doubt there is a foretaste of the unending glory, the bliss which is to know no lack or waning.

"I shall know. I shall be free from sin," were the dying words of a lovely woman who passed from here, while in her prime. Life full of brightness and usefulness, activities of every kind enlisting her hand, her pen, her thought; but she was ready and willing, even eager, to go over yonder. She went without a tremor, without a backward glance

Would it not be a comfort to those of us who are left desolate, when our dear ones go, if we could realize that they are gone only a little way, that heaven is not far distant, that but for our earth-dulled senses we might often discern its angels, and hear the rustle of their robes, or the sweet sounding of their golden harps? Surely our Saviour is never far away from any of us, and, where he is, there is heaven. A dear child of God, living in a remote part of the country, received a letter announcing the departure of her mother, whom she had not seen for years.

"I have felt much nearer my dear mother," she wrote, "since she went to heaven, than while she staid here. Heaven is far nearer to me than New Hampshire."

"Christians with Christ will be, soon and forever," we sing. Let us take the precious meaning into our very hearts. When we send one of the household away on a business errand to the ends of the earth, or a child away to school, we rest contentedly in the thought of their home coming. But when they go, out of sight, over yonder, there will be a happy home-going for us, and a happy home-welcoming from them, to us, when we reach the bright land.

Part of the host have crossed the flood,
And part are crossing now!

Dear friends, let us believe! Let us wait, let us look confidently to the opening of heaven's door, for Christ will swing it wide to let us in, and home is only over yonder. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

THE CHURCH AND THE MASSES.*

THE masses are not, I believe, alienated from Christianity. Here and there there are groups of men who, identifying Christianity with the churches, and feeling themselves antagonistic to them, aver that they are agnostics, atheists, infidels, anarchists, or what you will. These men for the most part, are few. The vast majority of the masses turn to Christ, and come to him and stay upon him, and so they will do to the end of time. They recognize him to have been a working-man, as they are themselves; a man acquainted with grief, as they know they must be; a man upon whom the burden of life pressed with terrific force. It is not the Christ of the evangelists that they cannot love, the Christ who came preaching the "gospel to the poor," whom the common people heard gladly; but it is the Christ of the churches, whom theology and philosophy have explained away from the ordinary affairs of life and made a mere abstraction; whom ecclesiasticism and traditionalism have made a sort of show-figure stiff with jewels and embroidery. The common people would hear Christ to-day as gladly as they did when he was here on earth, when his preachers came to them, as he came, in lowliness and in simplicity; when his confessors live, as he bade to them to live, in meekness and in mercy; when we who are Christians cease to be hypocrites, deceiving ourselves and seeming to deceive others.

And this we will cease to be when we give up our idols of wealth and of success and of pleasure, and live as Christ lived on earth; offering "ourselves—our souls and bodies—to be a reasonable, holy, and living sacrifice" to God and man for the sake of Christ, who saved us and all mankind from the doom of sin. It was said that the Roman augurs, when they examined the entrails of birds to find some omen for doing or not doing something, laughed one another in the face. Frankly, I wonder if we who confess and call ourselves Christians do not often do the same.

If there were a church unity, the masses feel that there would be churches built for the masses; that they would not be planted generally in the best quarters of the town, neither would they have the air of "clubs." The American people especially want to feel that the things they use belong to them. I am convinced that a great central church, built on a site where people most do congregate, with wide-open doors and daily prayers, with a large seating-space, yet with broad aisles, free to all, would, if built by Christians of all churches and denominations, and maintained by them with unity and order, have more to do with reconciling the masses to the Church of Christ than any one other thing—than many days passed in the discussion of differences, than many hundredweights of published arguments, advocating divers overtures and platforms. It would be a visible presentation of the fact of unity. And in this great church the preaching should be done by the best men of all kinds and orders, clerical and lay, who are believers in the divinity of Christ.

Christianity is the veritable salt and light of the world; without it there could have been no moral development of civilization, perhaps no development at all. With the loss of it humanity will retrograde and fall back into barbarism. It was the lack of moral standards that was the cause of the disintegration of the ancient empires of the world. We have therefore a duty to perform. We must bring the masses back into the churches—into the Church of Christ; for the Church, and nothing less, is the teacher of the doctrines of our Lord.

CHRIST'S SECOND COMING.

The Interval between Christ's Advent to the Air and His Advent to the Earth.

BY REV. RICHARD CHESTER.

MUCH of the difficulty commonly experienced in the study of prophecy arises from overlooking a period of time which is certainly indicated in Scripture. In trying to understand what Christ's coming will be, the superficial inquirer is apt to become confused by regarding as one event, an experience which has two distinct phases, separated by a considerable interval of time. We are told that Christ will come suddenly and unexpectedly, and we are also told of certain startling events which will precede his coming and put men on their guard. Is not the one statement inconsistent with the other? Not if we realize that one statement refers to his preliminary appearance and the other to his coming in judgment at a subsequent time.

When we take up the words of our blessed Lord himself upon the subject of his second Advent, we find an Advent put before us for a sudden occurrence of which we are ever and are to be ever and always on the watch, as an event which may on any day, at any hour, at any moment, take place, and of which he solemnly warns us that when it does take place, it will be "at such an hour as we think not." (Luke 12: 40). He will come, he tells us, to raise dead saints and to change living ones, "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." He will come to do this, with a suddenness upon his part, and an absense of foreknowledge upon theirs, which will find "two women grinding together at the same millstone," "two men working together in the same field," of whom one, being ready, will be "taken," the other, being unready, will be "left." "Behold!" he says, "I come as a thief." Therefore, he bids us to be ever on the watch tor his coming. He speaks of a coming of which he expressly forewarns us that it may take place "in the second watch or in the third watch." (See Luke 12: 35-40.) He says, further, "Watch ye, therefore, for ye know not when the Master of the house cometh, at even, at midnight, at cockcrowing, or in the morning, lest, coming suddenly, he find you sleeping." (Mark 13: 35-37). Here is one aspect of the Advent. But it is not the only one.

We find our blessed Lord speaking of his Second Coming thus: "Immediately, after the tribulation of those days, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers that are in the heavens shall be shaken," (very sure and solemn premonitory signals, these) "and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory" (no suddenness, no unexpectedness here!) We have, further, in exact accordance with this language, the prediction of the Advent (Zech. 14), when he comes at a time at which, after the Jew shall have been restored to Jerusalem, all nations shall be gathered in siege against them, and when, in the midst of this siege, he shall descend, and all his previously translated saints with him, and "his feet shall stand upon the Mount of Olives." We have, exactly corresponding with this, the prophecy of Enoch, as recorded in the epistle of Jude, of the descent of the Lord. And we have, lastly, the perfectly accordant prediction in Rev. 19 of the descent from the open heavens of the Son of God, followed by "the armies of heaven," to tread the winepress of his wrath, and to crush and destroy the last Antichrist and all his adherents with judgment.

THE STORY OF PILATE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing May 19. Matt. 27: 11-26.

PILATE'S conduct in relation to our Lord is described under the head of "Lesson Points" on page 296. In this place it is sufficient to indicate some of the lessons, applicable to modern life, which may be drawn from it. One of the most significant is that it is not wise to underestimate the power of spiritual truth. When the Jews told Pilate that Jesus claimed to be a king, he perceived at once the serious nature of the charge, recognized the danger to Roman rule implied by it, and looked into the matter promptly. But when he had examined the prisoner and learned that it was merely spiritual kingship that he claimed, that he was opposed to the use of arms, and that he had not objected to tribute being paid to Cæsar, Pilate felt that he had been deceived. This man was no conspirator, but a mere theorist, a mystic, not a practical man. Pilate did not think it was important what people believed, if they were law-abiding and paid their taxes. "What is truth?" he asked contemptuously. As if he would say: "Such questions may suit philosophers and may be very interesting, and there are many opinions about them. No one can be sure what truth is, and I have too much to do with facts and practical problems to waste time on theories." Yet see what power there was in this truth that Pilate set aside so lightly. Intangible and invisible truly, without support of arms, yet how it has revolutionized the world! How potent it is to-day, long after the might of imperial Rome has crumbled!

Another lesson is that it is not safe to trust in public opinion. In this day we have great faith in the voice of the people. The vote of the majority decides our national policy, and public opinion settles many important matters. Pilate thought that he might trust the people to declare for Jesus in preference to Barabbas. But they chose Barabbas. He was a man more after the people's taste. In our day we would call him a hustler. Jesus claimed to be a king, but what had he done in comparison with Barabbas to show a fitness for leadership? Barabbas had raised an insurrection, had killed people, and had gone to prison. It is not surprising that they preferred him, yet how wrong they were! No man need be afraid or ashamed to hold his own opinion of a man or a course of conduct, even though the majority is against him.

A third lesson is that it is not safe to have a bad record. It crippled Pilate and forced him to act contrary to his judgment and his conscience. If he had led a clean and upright life up to this point, he might have safely defied the Jews. They could have done him no harm. But he could not afford to defy them, for they could ruin him if he refused to oblige them. How many a man has been caught in the same way! Some disgraceful act in the past, some dark secret is known to a few, and that knowledge gives them power to compel obedience. A man with a secret is a slave. At some juncture in his life the threat of exposure may be made, and [illegible] the thing he is ashamed to do and hates to do, by his dread of the consequences of refusing.

Then we may learn, too, from Pilate's conduct that it is not safe to depend on any outward act for the remission of sin. All history holds Pilate responsible for the murder of the Son of God, because the execution could not have taken place without his consent. That Jesus would have been assassinated had Pilate refused to ratify the sentence, is probable. The priests and their dependents would not have allowed him to escape; but Pilate was responsible for doing his duty regardless of consequences. No ceremony, no washing of the body could clear his soul of that stupendous crime, nor can it cleanse any soul of sin now. Neither by the Lord's Supper nor by baptism can sin be taken away.

THE INTERNATIONAL Y. M. C. A. CONVENTION.

The date of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a red-letter-day in the calendar of Young Men's Christian Associations. It is the day set for the opening of the great International Convention at Springfield, Mass. It is expected that this will be the largest convention of the kind ever held in this country, and arrangements have been made for entertaining a host of delegates. Every Association is entitled to send two of its active members as delegates, and Associations with more than a hundred active members are entitled to send one additional delegate for every additional hundred. The Springfield Association, of whose building we give a picture on this page, has issued a cordial invitation, promising a hearty welcome to all friends of the Y. M. C. A. work. Mr. Frederick B. Platt of Brooklyn, the Chairman of the International Committee, whose portrait also appears on this page, has issued the preliminary Programme prepared by the Committee, and it indicates the prospect of a most profitable and enjoyable period. The Convention will continue five days. The morning sessions are to be held in the State Street Baptist Church, opposite the Association Building, and the evening sessions which are for the public, in the City Hall. Among the distinguished men who have promised to take part in the Convention are Dr. Cuyler, of Brooklyn; President Gates, of Amherst College; Col. John J. McCook, of New York; President J. M. Coulter, of Lake Forest University; Prof. Graham Taylor, of Chicago; Dr. James L. Barton, the new Secretary of the American Board; Gen. O.O. Howard, and Mr. D. L. Moody. Besides these, Mr. Pratt and the other officers of the International organization will speak on Association topics. One novel feature of the Convention, which certainly is entitled to a place in the programme, considering how important it has become, is an athletic exhibition which will be held in the Association's grounds on Alden street.

The Springfield Association, which is acting as host on this occasion, was organized in 1874. It has 327 members, of whom about one-third are on the active list. It has an excellent gymnasium, and its new building is equipped with all the modern apparatus for Association work.

AUSTRALIAN ENDEAVORERS.

That the Christian Endeavor spirit is spreading rapidly through the great Island Continent of the southern hemisphere is evident from a letter sent to the "Golden Rule" by Rev. W. J. L. Closs, President of the New South Wales Union. In the course of his letter, Mr. Closs says: "The first Australian Endeavor Convention, under the auspices of our United Society, has been decided upon. Up to the present time we have only been able to have our Colonial Conventions, with perhaps one or two delegates from the nighboring colonies; but now we anticipate the gathering annually of the Australian Endeavor forces. The honor and privilege of our first Convention goes to Adelaide, the capital city of South Australia and the home of our beloved president, the Rev. S. Mead. It will be held the first of next September. Last month I had the great pleasure and privilege of meeting with the Endeavorers of Queensland. A reception and public meeting were arranged in Brisbane, and a public meeting in Ipswich, for me, as the representative of the New South Wales Societies. Both meetings showed that there is no lack of Endeavor spirit "up in the north." The movement there has had to cope with many disadvantages, which have somewhat hindered the rapidity of its growth; but quietly and earnestly it has been progressing, doing the work thoroughly and commending itself to all. I fear that the removal of the Convention to Boston from San Francisco may prevent the attendance of some Australians who had hoped to be present. They will be at the Convention in spirit if not in body."

Formosa's Strange People.

Warlike and Semi-savage, Yet not without Peaceful Arts—The Island a Trophy of Conquest to Japan.

JAPAN has secured no greater prize, as the result of her war with China, than the island of Formosa, which lies off the south-east coast of the latter empire. It is not a very extensive territory, being only about 237 miles long and rather less than ninety miles in breadth, and in the past it has been distinguished more for the fierceness and barbarity of its people than for anything else. But it it a rich island and consequently a valuable commercial possession. It has several coal mines, and its rice fields produce a quality of the fragrant herb that cannot be excelled. It also abounds, too, in other products, such as fruits, nuts, sugar-cane, guavas, pine-apples, pepper, camphor and rice. Besides its position, in a strategical sense, makes it especially desirable to a nation that is strengthening itself by land and sea in every direction, as Japan is now doing.

Little was known of Formosa before 1590, when the adventurous Portuguese paid the island a visit and set up the nation's flag there. After them came those indefatigable colonists, the Dutch, who established a certain degree of civilization and developed the resources of the island. In 1660 they were driven out, and swarms of Chinese pirates took possession. Since that time the country has remained in Chinese hands.

A FORMOSAN GIRL WEAVING CLOTH.

In spite of the various changes of master the Formosans themselves still retain traits of their rude, aboriginal manners and customs. In the heart of the island the people are little better than savages. These mountaineers have never been fully subdued by conquest, and are adepts in the use of ancient weapons, especially the bow and spear. A native bowman is shown in one of the illustrations on this page, while another presents the more pleasing picture of a Formosan girl engaged in the peaceful and civilized occupation of weaving. The island women of the coast have been quick to adapt themselves to the ways of civilization, and have learned many of the arts common to their sex in that enlightened condition. They are docile, patient, good housekeepers and clever at the loom. They weave hemp fibres into a stout cloth, and from the banana fibre make a somewhat fine fabric. These belong to the class of semi-civilized aborigines known as "Pe-pa-hwan," who have adopted Chinese language, dress and customs, while their wilder brethren bear the name of "Che-hwan," an appellation indicative of savageism. There are many clans or factions in Formosa, and at least eight distinct dialects. The people are of medium height, broad-chested and muscular, with not unpleasant faces. Formerly the custom of tattooing was universal. The dead were buried in a sitting posture, and it was usual to preserve the heads of enemies slain in war as trophies of battle. Chambers were decorated with the ghastly sovvenirs of slaughter, and in order to inspire the young men with courage, they were required to sleep there.

It must not be imagined, however, that the general condition of the islanders is that of savages. On the contrary, the great majority show a considerable amount of skill in the arts of civilization, and very many houses are fitted up quite comfortably. Women occupy a less dependent position than in China, and it bas sometimes happened that the office of chieftain of a clan or family has been held by a woman. There are good roads, and some railway and telegraphic communication near the coast. On the western coast are several cities with a considerable population, the entire population of the island being about 1,500,000. For over thirty years missions have been conducted on the island by the Presbyterians, particularly in the northern part of the island.

Under the progressive rule of the Mikado's government, Formosa will probably make more rapid advances toward a civilized condition than it has ever done in the past. Law and order will be upheld, the invaders, very skilful in all the accomplishments of the new East, will mingle with the natives to such an extent that all barriers must soon be broken down. It is not improbable that, in the course of a few generations, the aboriginal type may entirely disappear from Formosa, being absorbed by the stranger, just as the Maori have almost vanished from New Zealand under the steady influx of the white race.

The Courteous Spirit.

Courtesy is the external manifestation of a right spirit toward others. Its basis is in an unselfish and a fitting regard for the rights and feelings of those with whom one is brought into intercourse; but the principles of its expression must be a matter of wise study on the part of those who have had experience in the ways of the world, and who would give the benefit of their experience to those who come after them. Courtesy is not merely a surface finish of maners; although courtesy is sure to show itself in a finished surface of manners. Good breeding, politeness, and fine manners are all included in the term "courtesy;" but these are all its expression rather than its essence and inspiration. "Good breeding," says one, "is made up of a multitude of petty sacrifices." "True politeness," says another, "is the spirit of benevolence showing itself in a refined way. It is the expression of good-will and kindness."

A Mexican Mission Home.

The mission homes of Mexico are, as a rule, of the type of the houses of all respectable well-to-do Mexicans; built in the form of a hollow square. The "patio," or inner court, presents a scene of freshness, beauty and brightness throughout the year. Here, shut in from sight and sound of the outside world the family find rest and pleasure. In the mission home, the "patio" is also the play-ground of the many bright-eyed children who have been gathered from various quarters and who form the larger part of the mission family. Their happy laughter rings out as a pleasant chord in the music of the daily life. The home-life in these missions, with its quiet, gentle Christian influences, has proved a wonderful character-builder. The value of this part of woman's work cannot be estimated; there is an indefinable something about it which makes other work seem small.

A Rose Changed a Life.

Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will recall the story of the poor girl known as "Blue-Bird, of Mulberry Bend," who was led to Christ by the simple gift of a pink rose, from the hands of a sympathetic Christian woman. Mrs. Bottome relates an incident in her own experience that will compare in interest with the first episode we have mentioned. She writes:

A NATIVE HUNTER.

"I have known wonderful work done by flowers. I know a woman who went to see a friend and was told that she was dangerously ill, and the doctor said no one could see her. My friend who made the call had but little money, but she bought the most beautiful, fragrant rose she could get the following day, and went again to see how the sick one was, and was told the doctor said she could not live. My friend said: "Will you ask the nurse to lay this on her bosom?" And as there could be no harm done in so doing, it was laid there, and then she went home praying that the life that was so needed might be spared. And God used that rose for the restoration of that woman. In an interval of reason her attention was arrested, and the doctor said that it had a strange effect on the patient, and from that moment a change for the better took place."

Modesty in Dress.

The becoming plainness in dress that is enjoined in Scripture is never designed as a humiliation; but it is a source of exalted pleasure in that it becomes an aid to the utmost freedom to serve God and men. The idea of wearing a garment to humiliate the soul is a relic of superstitious days. Never think to benefit the soul by any such false humiliation as that of wearing a garment because it is plain. It is the same as making a child read the Bible as a punishment. Anything that unduly exposes, deforms or endangers the health of the body is contrary to plainness. Both men and women frequently offend in these ways. The well-developed form, as God made it, comfortably, and decently clad is what religion demands.

GOD'S WAY.

OUR way had been to smooth her upward road,
Easing the pressure of each heavy load,
Never to let her white hand know a soil,
Never her back to feel the ache of toil.
Could we have shielded her from every care,
Kept her forever young and blithe and fair,
And from her body warded every pain,
As from her spirit all distress and strain;

This had been joy of joys, our chosen way.
God led her by a different path each day.
Sorrow and work and anxious care he gave,
And strife and anguish, till her soul grew brave.
Through weary nights she leaned upon his love,
Through cloudy days she fixed her gaze above.
Her dearest vanished; but in faith and trust
She knew them safe beyond the perished dust.

Refined by suffering, like a little child,
She grew; into her Father's face she smiled.
And then, one day of days, an angel came;
In flute-notes sweet, she heard him breathe her name.

Perhaps from out the rifted heaven she saw
Her mother's face look forth; in raptured awe
We caught the last swift glory in her eyes,
Ere, sleeping here, she woke in Paradise.

God's way was best, with reverent lips we say,
God's way is best, and praise our God to-day.

GRANDMA'S SPECTACLES.

GRANDMA'S "second-sight" had now come, and she would often let her glasses slip down, and then look over the top of them while she read. Grandma was pleased at this return of her vision, writes Rev. Dr. Talmage. Getting along so well without them, she often lost her spectacles. Sometime they would lie for weeks untouched on the shelf in the red morocco case, the flap uplifted. She could now look off upon the hills, which for thirty years she had not been able to see from the piazza. Those were mistaken who thought she had no poetry in her soul. You could see it in the way she put her hand under the chin of a primrose, or cultured the geranium. Sitting on the piazza one evening in her rocking chair, she saw a ladder of cloud set up against the sky, and thought how easy it would be for a spirit to climb it. She saw in the deep glow of the sunset a chariot of fire, drawn by horses of fire, and wondered who rode in it. She saw a vapor floating thinly away, as though it were a wing ascending, and Grandmother muttered in a low tone: "A vapor that appeareth for a little season, and then vanisheth away." She saw a hill higher than any she had ever seen before on the horizon, and on the top of it a King's castle. The motion of the rocker became slighter and slighter, until it stopped. The spectacles fell out on her lap. A child, hearing it, ran to pick them up, and cried: "Grandmother, what is the matter?" She answered not. She never spake again.

Home Purity.

To make one's own home pure and bright may seem to some too low an aim to absorb and control a noble life. But if every one did only this all the abodes of sin would cease from the world and Divine consolation and sanctified sympathy would be ready balm for every affliction. A home made beautiful and happy by culture, taste and Christian love is a concrete Gospel, an object lesson of the blessedness of those, who are bound in the fellowship of spiritual life and faith in God and hope in heaven. Too many Christians neglect their homes. God gives no gift so precious as the gift of sons and daughters; and provides for us no happiness like the happiness of the home. When family religion ceases all religious profession and ceremony are empty and false. The family altar means far more than the public sanctuary. The chief duty of the Christian is in his home.

Recalled Stormy Times.

"Well that looks natural," said the old soldier, looking at a can of condensed milk on the breakfast table in place of ordinary milk that failed on account of the storm. "Its the Gail Borden Eagle Brand we used during the war."

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER XVII.

Called to Testify.

THE door of the room where Mrs. Wilson sat reading opened, and her daughter Louie entered with a document in her hand. "Mamma, what does this mean?" she asked. "A man came to the door and inquired for me and Nettie, and gave us each a paper; Nettie is in her room sobbing and crying over hers, and I have brought mine to you, as I cannot understand it; it says at the top 'Subpœna,' and commands me to appear at court at 10 A. M. as a witness, or a lot of dreadful things will be the consequence."

Mrs. Wilson was very pale, her lips were firmly compressed, and her eyes had a severe and determined look, and yet she was evidently surprised.

"It is very strange that they should have acted in this manner. I gave strict orders that neither you nor your father was to be called upon, under any circumstances."

"Oh! mamma, you have not had Alice arrested and publicly charged with stealing my bracelet, have you? Surely you could not be so cruel," said Louie, sobbing.

"My child, sit down and calm your feelings. I have only done my duty, as a mother who is bound to defend the purity and respectability of her home. A sense of justice compelled me to perform (although painful to myself), a duty I owed to society. I introduced the unprincipled girl into our home, and had I held my tongue, others of our set might, from my example, have trusted her, and there is no telling where the mischief might have ended."

"Well, mamma," said Louie, breaking in, "I feel confident that you are making a fearful mistake now, and one that you will be sorry for as long as you live."

"Louie, how dare you talk to your mother in that way," said Alfreda. "She has positive proof of the girl's guilt, and do you think a gentleman like Mr. Jackson would speak of a girl as he does of her, if he were not thoroughly convinced of her evil character? I do hope this may be a lesson to you, and that hereafter you will not make friends and treat as equals those beneath you in social position."

"I think," said Louie, "that Mr. Jackson has acted like anything but a gentleman in this case. Why does he not say to her face what he insinuates behind her back? Oh, no, we are not to mention his name to her, or she would know at once where we got our information. Who asked him to be a detective to hunt down a poor fatherless girl? Why don't he face her, and not keep in the dark and say things behind her back like a coward. If I could only see her, I would tell her all he has said about her. I believe Mr. Jackson would do meaner things than Alice would ever think of doing."

"That's because you are a simpleton," said Alfreda in a passion, "and one day you will be sorry for all the mean things you have said about him."

"It is time we were getting ready, so please stop this unseemly conversation," said Mrs. Wilson. "But what they can want of you and Nettie at the court, I cannot think; they told me I should only be detained a few minutes, as of course she would plead guilty when she saw there was no chance of escape."

"This does not look like pleading guilty," said Louie. "You may depend, mamma, that Alice is going to establish her innocence. Some one is plotting against her and trying to ruin her. I shall say so if I get an opportunity. I will tell the judge I believe she did not take the bracelet."

"Yes, I believe you would," said Alfreda, "even if it lost the case. You would not care about contradicting mamma in open court. But you will have no chance. I have read how they do in these courts, and people are not allowed to say just what they like. You won't have to do anything but answer questions. They won't ask you what you believe, but whether the bracelet is yours, and when you had it last. Then this girl will have to show how she came to be pawning a valuable bracelet belonging to some one else. You won't be permitted to insult mamma before the judge."

"I don't want to insult mamma," said Louie. "Mamma is mistaken that is all. She thinks Alice stole the bracelet. That wicked Mr. Jackson led her to think so. But she didn't steal it, I am sure of that. She is not that kind of girl. I would never believe it, whoever said so."

"I wish you would stop talking nonsene, Louie," said Mrs. Wilson severely. "Here have I been warned against a servant who has come to me under a false name. Even she, with all her effrontery did not deny that she did that. Then a bracelet is lost, and this girl who gave the name of Brown and so misrepresented herself is found pawning that bracelet. I know she could have stolen it, if she wished, as she had opportunity, so I have just ground for suspicion. I think she will find it hard to clear herself. She will go to State's Prison, I firmly believe."

"You speak, mamma, as if you hoped she would," said Louie.

"Well, I want justice done. I think when a person steals, that is the best place for them. I am not vindictive; I would have spared her if she had given up the bracelet and said she was sorry and would never steal again. But she was impudent and insulting and showed no contrition."

"Oh, you could not expect her to do that, mamma, if she did not steal the bracelet. You may depend she can explain everything. You would not be so prejudiced against her, if Mr. Jackson had not poisoned your mind. You would have asked her to explain instead of charging her with being a thief. You let him insinuate those wicked suspicions. I would not take his word against any one. I believe he is a bad, wicked man. I wonder how Freda can let him pay her attentions. I shall be ashamed if he is ever my brother-in-law."

"You can spare your shame, Louie," cried Alfreda, blushing violently. "He is much more likely to be ashamed of you with your low companions and your propensity to associate with common people. I do not know that he is ever likely to be related to you, but if I accept him, I shall expect you to show him proper respect."

The maid, Nettie, had come into the room during the conversation and was listening intently with an agitated face. Mrs. Wilson noticed her and bade her go and get ready to go to court, remarking as the girl left the room, "I cannot think what it is distresses that girl so. She always stays and stares when Mr. Jackson's name is mentioned in her hearing. I wonder if she has been in his employ at any time."

"Perhaps she knows someone of that name, and confuses the two persons," said Alfreda. "It is not likely that she knows Mr. Jackson. He would have no occasion to employ such a girl as Nettie, and being in a totally different class, she would not be likely to make his acquaintance."

"No, and yet there is no mistaking her interest in it, and it is not a pleasant interest. She is affected in some way, or thinks she is. I will ask Mr. Jackson about her. I think she is too deep to answer any questions. Besides, she is quite hysterical."

CHAPTER XVIII.

A Broken Promise.

"Now I never was in such a fix in all me loife," said Mrs. Callaghan to herself as she darted about the room putting things to rights. "Sure I don't know phat to do; they have taken the young creature away to court, and bedad not a trimble was in her voice when she spoke or in her step when she walked; she looked as brave as a lion. I felt as proud of her as if she was me own. 'Well,' says she to me, 'You will not be wanted for an hour or more, and keep it from mother, for she has a suspicion that something is wrong;' and I was so flusterated that I said I would, and now I'm troubled about what I orter do; the mother in me says, 'tell Mrs. Mapleton all about it,' and sure I want to; then my worrud given to the swate girl says, 'keep mum you ould idjet.' Now, if it was my child that was in trouble and a person didn't tell me, as knew, I'd never forgive them. Now, Mrs. Mapleton is a loving mother and she'd give her life for Alice; of course she's an invalid, but I do be thinking if I were to tell her, the grit in her would rise right up, for I know it's there, and she'd say, 'thank you, Mrs. Callaghan, I must go to my daughter and stand by her, and you're a good woman for telling me all about it, and I never would have spoken to you again if you hadn't.' But then, if I tell her, and she goes to fainting and screeching, phat would I do and phat would Miss Alice say to me, and I'd rather take a bating than offend her. I'll go in and fix up her rooms, and trust the good Lord to tell me phat to do."

"Good-morning, Mrs. Callaghan," was Mrs. Mapleton's greeting. "It does me good to see your healthy-looking, good-natured face, but you are looking troubled it seems to me?"

"It's proud I am to hear you say that," said Mrs. Callaghan; "and you are better this morning thin you have been, are ye not, mum?"

"Oh yes, I am much better. I took a long walk yesterday and it did me so much good." Then Mrs. Mapleton watched her visitor as she flew about the room putting things in the wrong places, and making confusion rather than order with the furniture and other things in the room. At last she said, "Mrs. Callaghan, you have something on your mind, which you wish to tell me, but do not like to. Now tell me what it is."

Mrs. Callaghan came and stood in front of her and said, "It's right ye are, mum, I have something on me moind, and I'm going to tell ye, as I'd want to be tould if I were in your place. You are a lady and I am a poor working-woman; you are edicated and I am ignorant, but says I to meself, 'she's a mother and so am I,' and there we are alike and can understand one another."

"It's something about Alice,—is she sick or hurt? Tell me quick, my good woman."

"No mum, she's not hurted or sick, she is quite safe, but its in trouble she is. I promised her I would not tell you: some mean, dirty enemy has made a charge against her, but she'll come out all right; good, true friends are wid her at the present minute." Then she told her the whole story as far as she knew it.

Mrs. Mapleton sat perfectly still during the recital, the blood would rush to her face and then recede until her features looked as if chiselled out of white marble.

"Maybe its wrong I've been doing in telling ye, but I says to myself, says I, 'if she's the mother I take her to be, (and sure I believe you're all that), she'd rather be beside her swate girl in court to give her courage, than to be sitting in her own room; and mum, it's not afraid ye need be, for ye'll see the blessed girl walk out of court lik a queen while the lying spalpeens will be knocked into smithereens."

"Mrs. Callaghan," said Mrs. Mapleton in a calm, firm voice, "you are a good and noble woman; you have done perfectly right in telling me all, and I shall respect you as long as I live. You have made me strong by showing me how weak and selfish I have been in letting her young shoulders carry nearly all the load."

"Shure how could ye help it, and ye not able to hould up your head for the sickness and great trouble ye have had."

Mrs. Mapleton was putting on her bonnet. "Would you show me the way to the court-room, Mrs. Callaghan?"

"Shure its meself that's going there this blissed minute, and its into the witness box I'm goin', too. Mr. Graham came to tell me this morning. I told him he needn't leave any paper to make me come, its only too glad I'd be to get the chance, for I found out something from him that even Miss Alice doesn't know. I wanted to give her a surprise, and will ye moind to kape your eye on Mrs. Wilson's (bad luck to her) ugly face when oim in the witness-box. Will ye lean on my arm, mam?"

"Oh, Mrs. Callaghan," said Mrs. Mapleton, as they descended the stairs, "h shall I ever be able to repay you for your kindness?"

Shure mam, you've paid me widin de hour more nor ye ever owed me for a thing I've ever done for yez, by show the grit that's in yez. I knew it was th and it makes my heart as light as a feat to see ye bearing up as ye are. And ye plaze get on a big smile when ye e the court, so that the blissed child know that its all right when she sees it.

Thus two parties were on their wa the old court-room. But others were t there who had an interest in the case. tective Graham had not been idle. He conceived a more than professional lik for Alice, and apart from that, his pr sional spirit was stirred. His rival, Bri was active on the other side, and that cer, in Graham's opinion, would be all better for a lesson. He needed to be ta to have less confidence in his own abili which Graham thought he over estima This was a good opportunity, and Gra availed himself of it with pleasure.

A very busy time the detective had pa since he left Alice in Mr. Jacobs' parlo previous day. There were several thr of evidence in his hands, and they ne to be followed up. In a quiet, incide way Graham went from place to pl looking as if he were simply stro around, wishing he had something to He talked with one and another as if ju pass the time, but when the interview over and he strolled on, the detective's wore a look of triumph and keen en ment. HE WESTERN RELIEF FUND.

Se eral delayed reports from Volunteer Dis butors in the Western Relief work hav been received during the week. There are ill a number of reports expected from sca ring localities. Among the letters of the eek was one containing a copious ac- cou of the distribution of a car-load of clo ng at Hill City, Kan., accompanied by complete set of vouchers, etc., showing hat the committee's work was thoroughly and faithfully performed.

Ed tor Hudson, of the "Capital," Topek Kan., writes as follows:

Yo last liberal donation ($500) was received. With t an hour's delay I used it in helping to buy flou neal, &c., that went out in four car-loads to Wes n Kansas. You never will know how much goo ese liberal donations have done the people of Wes n Kansas. I went away from home in such a hur I did not have time to acknowledge the receipt the money, but the people got the food and clothing and are deeply grateful. I have just returned hom and will finish up the aid work this week, and mak full report of my operations.

Scott's Emulsion

is not a secret remedy. It is simply the purest Norway Cod-liver Oil, the finest Hypophosphites, and chemically pure Glycerine, all combined into a perfect Emulsion so that it will never change or lose its integrity. This is the secret of Scott's Emulsion's great success. It is a most happy combination of flesh-giving, strengthening and healing agents, their perfect union giving them remarkable value in all

WASTING DISEASES.

Hence its great value in Consumption, wherein it arrests the wasting by supplying the most concentrated nourishment, and in Anæmia and Scrofula it enriches and vitalizes the blood. In fact, in every phase of wasting it is most effective. Your doctor will confirm all we say about it. Don't be persuaded to accept a substitute!

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitute. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily, Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent pr cher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of stimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, Fever & and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

THE HUMBLE WORKER.

I HAVE no gift of eloquence
To preach, exhort or pray,
I cannot point with glowing words
To Christ the living way;
But I can tell how wondrous dear
My Jesus is to me,
And let his light so clearly shine
That all around may see.

I cannot cast the fishers' net
Into life's deep, dark sea;
The wisdom for that heavy task
Was never given to me;
But I can kneel upon the shore,
And pray for those who toil,
And when the boats come slowly in,
Help gather up the spoil.

The Master sees the lowest work
Of all his children true,
And in the crowning day will give
To each his honest due:
And when the sheaves are gathered in
From fields that I have sown,
I then shall take from his own hand
The palm, the robe, the crown.

THE HUMAN HAIR

Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER, F. R. A. S., L. D. G. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa.

"Every one should read this little book."—Ad.

FORGIVENESS.

"I will not remember thy sins."

PEACE, peace, poor soul, thy sins have been forgiven,
What pain, why torture, thy mysterious part
And strive to pay God's pardon by thy smart?
Christ has acknowledged thee before high heav'n.
And dost thou deem it gracious thus to moan,
That when the angels come to look at thee,
They'll wonder what the Lord has left undone,
That thou so sadly greetest his decree?
Are sighs and groans the tribute thou should'st bring
To ease the ears of thy redeeming King?
Hear once again "Thy sins are all forgiven,"
And those words thy record hath been riven;
The awful past belongs to thee no more,
'Twas that thy stricken, dying Saviour bore.

IT SEEMS REASONABLE

In cases of sickness to re-enforce the vital powers with the very thing on which they thrive in order that they may drive out any lurking disease rather than to introduce rank poisons, which most medicines are, into the system. Electropoise does the reasonable thing. It puts the body into such a condition as to be able to absorb oxygen more freely through the lungs and through the pores as well. It is thermal electricity. These are our theories about it but the facts are that it works marvellous cures throughout the entire domain of disease.

A SINGLE INSTANCE

Chronic Dyspepsia.

WEST NEW BRIGHTON, S. I., N. Y., July 11, 1894.

Unknown to most of my friends, I was for more than ten years a subject of chronic dyspepsia, which gave rise to many other aggravating complaints, especially affecting the heart with severe pains.

Less than a year ago my attention was called to the Electropoise. The heart trouble had become exasperating; the pains at times intense and prolonged. I was faithful in the use of the little instrument, knowing that chronic cases always require time for a cure. My surprise may be imagined when, in less than a week, I was conscious of marked effects for the better, and a sense of general "toning up" of the system. Now, after six months, my appetite needs no improvement; I eat all varieties of wholesome foods and feel no harm. My pulse is regular, and palpitation of the heart has ceased. I have regained my weight.

One fact I wish to emphasize—I no longer carry medicines around with me, for I have no use for them either "before meals" or "after meals," or "one at bed-time;" not even a dose of "pepsin."

The Electropoise is easily applied; nevertheless, those who most carefully study the book of directions will get the best results. A fool would probably abandon its use after one or two applications, because it don't give "any shock," or other sensation to let you know what it is doing.

If any persons, especially ministers, suffering from the horrors of dyspepsia, wish any further particulars of my case, I shall be pleased to inform them, for I shall feel it a pleasant duty to aid them in securing that degree of health which will increase their joy and usefulness.

REV. W. H. BOOLE.

A REASONABLE WOMAN'S TRIBUTE TO ELECTROPOISE.

Is it possible you've not heard!
I'll tell you in a single word,
I bought one, and presto! vanished
Doctors, nurses. Drugs are banished.

It seems so simple, it is true
You would not dream that it could do
What I have seen; but it is so,
"To see is to believe, yon know.

We sneeze, no cold need be endured.
"Electropoise," relief secured.
In short, for ills our flesh hath heired,
"Electropoise," then we are spared.

This seeming simple instrument
A blessing to our home was sent;
Physicians, medicines combined,
Not yet its functions all defined.

We women of this age are wise
In that we take up specialties;
The "how" of the Electropoise
Is naught, it cures my girls and boys.

The science. I will leave for those Who nature's secrets can disclose,
As well might I now undertake.
To tell how blood our food can make.

Or just exactly how the will Impels to motion or makes still;
Or why the thought precedes the acts.
For present use, enough the facts.

STEEL TANKS

We furnish steel tanks with covers, all galvanized after completion, in nests of ten, 8 to 12 feet high and 30 to 36 inches in diameter, at 2½c. per gallon. They do not rust, shrink, leak, give taste to water, nor allow foreign substances to get in. They can be put in garret or barn and thus are protected from freezing. They take no setting up, are cheaper than wood. Tank substructures of all sizes made to order. Send for price list and designs for substructure and ornamental water supply.

AERMOTOR CO. CHICAGO.

2½ CTS PER GAL.

Did you ever stop to think how completely the Aermotor Co. made the modern windmill business? How it has monopolized this entire line of manufacture because of its ideas, inventions, designs, qualities and prices, or forced others to be literal and servile imitators? Witness the steel wheel, the back geared pumper, the high geared power mill, the steel towers, fixed and tilting, the galvanizing of work after completion, the grinder centrifugal feed, the improved irrigating and other pumps, the all steel pole saw—one of the most popular things we ever put out—the steel storage and stock tanks. Everything we have touched we have bettered and cheapened. It is the thing we have delighted in and it has paid. We have established a score of branch houses, so as to have all these goods near those who want them. The Aermotor Co. has but one more ambition. It wants to build and fill one more new building. It has 2 acres of land at its present location unoccupied by buildings. It expects to commence in June to cover that 2 acres with a single building, 7 stories high. This will give it 14 more acres of floor space. Then when the public demand requires more goods than can be produced with this added space, it will refuse to extend further, or make any effort. It will have done its share to supply that demand. It will then turn away all new comers. UNTIL THAT TIME IT EXPECTS TO CONTINUE TO SUPPLY THE WORLD WITH THE GREATER PART OF ITS WIND WHEELS, TOWERS, GRINDERS, FEED CUTTERS, PUMPS, STEEL FRAME BUZZ SAWS, STEEL STORAGE AND STOCK TANKS, STEEL SUBSTRUCTURES, ETC., ETC., GALVANIZED AFTER COMPLETION. IT WILL CONTINUE TO DEAL MOST LIBERALLY WITH THE PUBLIC, FURNISH REPAIRS AT A LOW PRICE, AND BE THE GREAT MODEL SQUARE-DEALING WIND POWER AND WATER SUPPLY HOUSE OF THE WORLD. AERMOTOR CO., CHICAGO.

DAUGHTERS OF THE ORIENT.

Efforts in their Behalf by their Christian Sisters in the West—A Great Moral and Educational Work—Some Familiar Types.

IN no part of the world to-day are greater energies being employed in elevating the moral and intellectual status of womanhood than in Palestine. Schools, Christian Missions and classes for training in the accomplishments of civilization have been multiplied throughout the land. The rich seed of the Gospel is already bearing fruit in many thousands of Syrian homes in the cities and villages. Both to an inheritance of custom and tradition there has changed but little since the days when our Saviour trod the hills and plains of Judea, the daughters of Palestine may have been slow to reject the innovations that have come as the result of contact with the people of the Western world. Their simple lives, prescribed duties, established, by many generations of usage, their social position in the home and elsewhere, and their exceedingly limited opportunities for intellectual and spiritual growth, have all combined to keep them dutifully in the well-worn ancestral grooves. But the influences now at work for their enlightenment are opening up new avenues of usefulness and happiness. It may yet take many years, but in due time education and the Gospel will surely succeed in lifting up the daughters of the Orient to a position more beautiful and queenly than even their own poets and seers could have dreamed.

That such a transformation is even now in progress, cannot be doubted, when the numerous agencies successfully at work are considered. To the Moslem, Bedouin, and Syrian peasant, the Gospel is freely taught, and the fathers and mothers of Palestine no longer shrink from permitting their children to come in contact with Christian teachings. The Church Missionary Society of England has been vigorously evangelizing and educating in Palestine since 1843 and occupies the field from Acre to Hebron and Gaza, and from Mount Hermon to the Land of Moab, with stations at Acca, Gaza, Jaffa, Haifa, Nablous, Ramallah, Nazareth, Es-Salt (the ancient Ramoth Gilead), and elsewhere. Another agency of far-reaching and inestimable value is the Syrian Mission of the American Presbyterian Board, whose educational work—the most extensive of this character in the Holy Land—has been progressing steadily since 1870. Besides these, the United Presbyterian Church of America, British Syrian Bible Mission, Society of Friends and German Evangelical Church, are actively engaged in the same field, and there are also many homes, schools and institutes of a special character devoted exclusively to the women of Palestine. Many noble Christian ladies have consecrated their lives and means to the enlightenment of this neglected class, among them being Miss Crawford, who established the Bethany Home in 1889, the Kaiserswerth Deaconesses with orphanages at Jerusalem and Beyrout, Miss Taylor with a school for Moslem and Druze women also at Beyrout, Miss Kawar (a native Syrian), at Nazareth, Miss Arnott's school, Miss Mangan's Medical Mission at Jaffa and Mrs. Jamal's Training Class for poor Syrian girls at Jerusalem, to whose support many of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have given generous aid.

A MOSLEM FRUIT-SELLER. A BEDOUIN MOTHER. A CHRISTIAN MATRON.
A BETHLEHEM MAID. A YOUNG GIRL OF NAZARETH.

WOMEN OF MODERN PALESTINE.

As in all lands where the masses of the population are very poor, the conditions of life in Syria are quite simple. It is a country of homes. The word "father" is applied equally to the parent, the leader of a party, the ruler of a nation and the founder of a people. Motherhood, too, is honored; but the general status of woman is still low. Islamism holds woman in a condition of perpetual bondage, degrading and keeping her in a state of ignorance and dependence.

Our group of illustrations presents a picturesque variety of feminine types, as they are found in Palestine to-day. The Moslem orange-seller is met in every Oriental city, from Damascus to Cairo and Alexandria. The Bedouin mother, like the women of her class in Egypt and Arabia, loves to adorn herself with gold and silver coins and other ornaments to an extent that is in marked contrast with her clothing and the poverty of her usual surroundings; but she clings to the Eastern custom which allows a woman to carry all her personal wealth in this strange fashion. It is a custom as old as the days of Moses. The Christian matron—probably a dweller in some town or village not remote from Jerusalem—also has her personal wealth displayed in the abundance of gold and silver coins that bespangle her dress; the maiden of Bethlehem, hardly yet a woman, has her dowry bestowed in necklace, bracelets and headdress, while the young Nazarene reveals all her riches in the jingling rows of coins that burden her ears and almost conceal her forehead, like a rude tiara. With those simple people, the hoarding of gold and silver coins, for purposes of personal adornment, is begun in childhood, and when womanhood is reached, a bride's dowry and a wife's wealth are thus carried openly in view of all. It is not an uncommon incident to meet some poorly-clad peasant or wretched-looking Bedouin almost weighted down with these swaying head-dresses and glittering necklaces, that seem sadly out of place beside the garments of coarse cotton or black goat's hair. Syrian women mature early and age rapidly. In youth they are usually graceful in carriage, and many have faces of great beauty, with deep, dusky eyes and features of a delicate olive tint. The beauty of the Bethlehem women is proverbial, a gift they ascribe to their Crusader ancestry.

WORDS WITH YOUNG MEN.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage, preached Sunday afternoon, May 12, 1895.*

THOSE six young men, I suppose, represent innumerable young men who are about undertaking the battle of life, and who have more interrogation points in their mind than any printer's case ever contained, or printer's fingers ever set up. But few people who have passed fifty years of age are capable of giving advice to young men. Too many begin their counsel by forgetting they ever were young men themselves. November snows do not understand May-time blossom week. The East wind never did understand the South wind. Autumnal golden-rod makes a poor fist at lecturing about early violets. Generally, after a man has rheumatism in his right foot, he is not competent to discuss juvenile elasticity. Not one man out of a hundred can enlist and keep the attention of the young after there is a bald spot on the cranium. I attended a large meeting in Philadelphia, assembled to discuss how the Young Men's Christian Association of that city might be made more attractive for young people, when a man arose and made some suggestions with such lugubrious tone of voice, and a manner that seemed to deplore that everything was going to ruin, that an old friend of mine, at seventy-five years as young in feeling as anyone at twenty, arose and said: "That good brother who has just addressed you will excuse me for saying that a young man would no sooner go and spend an evening among such funereal tones of voice and funereal ideas of religion which that brother seems to have adopted, than he would go and spend the evening in Laurel Hill Cemetery." And yet these young men of Ohio, and all young men, have a right to ask those who have had many opportunities of studying this world and the next world, to give helpful suggestion as to what theories of life one ought to adopt, and what dangers he ought to shun. Attention, young men!

First: Get your soul right. You see, that is the most valuable part of you. It is the most important room in your house. It is the parlor of your entire nature. Put the best pictures on its walls. Put the best music under its arches. It is important to have the kitchen right, and the dining-room right, and the cellar right, and all the other rooms of your nature right; but, Oh! the parlor of the soul! Be particular about the guests who enter it. Shut its doors in the faces of those who would despoil and pollute it. There are princes and kings who would like to come into it, while there are assassins who would like to come out from behind its curtains, and with silent foot attempt the desperate and murderous. Let the King come in. He is now at the door. Let me be usher to announce his arrival, and introduce the King of this world, the King of all worlds, the King eternal, immortal, invisible. Make room. Stand back! Clear the way. Bow, kneel, worship the King. Have him once for your Guest, and it does not make much difference who comes or goes. Would you have a warrantee against moral disaster, and surety of a noble career? Read at least one chapter of the Bible on your knees every day of your life.

Word the next: Have your body right. "How are you?" I often say when I meet a friend of mine in Brooklyn. He is over seventy, and alert and vigorous, and very prominent in the law. His answer is, "I am living on the capital of a well-spent youth." On the contrary, there are hundreds of thousands of good people who are suffering the results of early sins. The grace of God gives one a new heart, but not a new body. David, the Psalmist, had to cry out, "Remember not the sins of my youth." Let a young man make his body a wine-closet, or a rum jug, or a whiskey cask, or a beer barrel, and smoke poisoned cigarettes until his hand trembles, and he is black under the eyes, and his cheeks fall in, and then at some church seek and find religion: yet, all the praying he can do will not hinder the physical consequences of natural law fractured. You six young men of Ohio, and all the young men, take care of your eyes, those windows of the soul. Take care of your ears, and listen to nothing that depraves. Take care of your lips, and see that they utter no profanities. Take care of your nerves by enough sleep and avoiding unhealthy excitements, and by taking out-door exercise, whether by ball, or skate, or horseback, lawn-tennis, or exhilarating bicycle, if you sit upright and do not join that throng of several hundred thousands who by the wheel are cultivating crooked backs, and cramped chests, and deformed bodies, rapidly coming down toward all-fours, and the attitude of the beasts that perish. Anything that bends body, mind, or soul to the earth is unhealthy. Oh, it is a grand thing to be well, but do not depend on pharmacy and the doctors to make you well. Stay well. Read John Todd's Manual, and Coombs' Physiology, and everything you can lay your hands on about mastication, and digestion, and assimilation. Where you find one healthy man or woman, you find fifty half dead. From my own experience I can testify that, being a disciple of the gymnasium, many a time just before going to the parallel bars, and punching bags, and pullies and weights, I thought Satan was about taking possession of society and the church and the world, but after one hour of climbing and lifting and pulling, I felt like hastening home so as to be there when the millennium set in. Take a good stout run every day. I find in that habit, which I have kept up since at eighteen years I read the aforesaid Todd's Manual, more recuperation than in anything else. Those six men of Ohio will need all possible nerve, and all possible eyesight, and all possible muscular development before they get through the terrific struggle of this life.

Word the next: Take care of your intellect. Here comes the flood of novelettes, ninety-nine out of a hundred belittling to every one that opens them. Here come depraved newspapers, submerging good and elevated American journalism. Here comes a whole perdition of printed abomination, dumped on the breakfast table, and tea table, and parlor table. Take at least one good newspaper with able editorial and reporters' columns mostly occupied with helpful intelligence, announcing marriages and deaths and reformatory and religious assemblages, and charities bestowed, and the doings of good people, and giving but little place to nasty divorce cases, and stories of crime, which, like cobras, sting those that touch them. Oh, for more newspapers that put virtue in what is called great-primer type, and vice in nonpareil or agate! You have all seen the photographer's negative. He took a picture from it ten or twenty years ago. You ask him now for a picture from that same negative. He opens the great chest containing the black negatives of 1885, or 1875, and he reproduces the picture. Young men, your memory is made up of the negatives of an immortal photography. All that you see or hear goes into your soul to make pictures for the future. You will have with you till the Judgment Day the negatives of all the bad pictures you have ever looked at, and of all the debauched scenes you have read about. Show me the newspapers you take and the books you read, and I will tell you what are your prospects for well-being in this life, and what will be your residence a million years after the star on which we now live shall have dropped out of the constellation. I never travel on Sunday unless it be a case of necessity or mercy. But last Autumn I was in India in a city plague-struck. By the hundreds the people were down with fearful illness. We went to the apothecary's to get some preventive of the fever, and the place was crowded with invalids, and we had no confidence in the preventive we purchased from the Hindoos. The mail train was to start Sabbath evening. I said, "Frank, I think the Lord will excuse us if we get out of this place with the first train;" and we took it, not feeling quite comfortable till we were hundreds of miles away. I felt we were right in flying from the plague. Well, the air in many of our cities is struck through with a worse plague—the plague of corrupt and damnable literature. Get away from it as soon as possible. It has already ruined the bodies, minds and souls of a multitude which, if stood in solid column, would reach from New York Battery to Golden Horn. The plague! The plague!

Word the next: Never go to any place where you would be ashamed to die. Adopt that plan, and you will never go to any evil amusement, nor be found in compromising surroundings. How many startling cases within the past few years of men called suddenly out of this world, and the newspapers surprised us when they mentioned the locality and the companionship. To put it on the least important ground, you ought not to go to any such forbidden place, because if you depart this life in such circumstances, you put officiating ministers in great embarrassment. You know that some of the ministers believe that all who leave this life go straight to heaven, however they have acted in this world, or whatever they have believed. To get you through from such surroundings is an appalling theological undertaking. One of the most arduous and besweating efforts of that kind that I ever knew of was at the obsequies of a man who was found dead in a snow bank with his rum-jug close beside him. But the minister did the work of happy transference as well as possible, although it did seem a little inappropriate when he read, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. They rest from their labors, and their works do follow them." If you have no mercy upon yourself, have mercy upon the minister who may be called to officiate after your demise. Die at home, or in some place of honest business, or where the laughter is clean, or amid companionships pure and elevating. Remember that any place we go to may become our starting-point for the next world. When we enter the harbor of Heaven, and the Officer of Light comes aboard, let us be able to show that our clearing papers were dated at the right port.

Word the next: As soon as you can, by industry and economy, have a home of your own. What do I mean by a ho[me]? I mean two rooms and the blessing of [God] on both of them; one room for slum[ber], one for food, its preparation and the [en]joyment taking thereof. Mark you, I would [not] you to have a home with thirty rooms [all] upholstered, pictured and statuetted, [but] I am putting it down at the minimum [of] husband and wife who cannot be happy with a home made up of two rooms will not be happy in heaven if they get [there]. He who wins and keeps the affection [of a] good practical woman has done glorious [work]. What do I mean by a good woman? I mean one who loved God before she loved you. What do I mean by a practical man? I mean one who can help you earn a living, for a time comes in a[lmost] every man's life when he is flung off misfortune, and you do not want a [wife] sniffling about how she had it before she married her. The simple reason why [thou]sands of men never get on in the world because they married nonentities and [never] got over it. The only thing that Job's wife proposed for his boils was a warm poultice of profanity, saying, "Curse God and [die]." It adds to our admiration of John Wesley the manner in which he conquered domestic unhappiness. His wife had slandered him all over England until standing in his pulpit in City Road Chapel he complained to the people saying, "I have been charged with every crime in the catalogue except drunkenness:" when his wife arose from the back part of the church and said, "[John], you know you were drunk last night." Then Wesley exclaimed, "Thank God the catalogue is complete." When a man marries, he marries for heaven or hell, and [is] more so when a woman marries. Two [of] young men in Fayette, Ohio, had better look out.

Word the next: Do not rate yourself too high. Better rate yourself too low. If you rate yourself too low, the world will say, "Come up." If you rate yourself too high, the world will say, "Come down." It is a bad thing when a man gets so exaggerated an idea of himself as did Earl of Buchan, whose speech Ballantyne, the Edinburgh printer, could not set up for publication because he had not enough capital I's and [for] his type. Remember that the world got along without you near six thousand years before you were born, and unless some meteor collides with us, or some internal convulsion occurs, the world will probably last several thousand years after you are dead.

Word the next: Do not postpone too long doing something decided for God and humanity and yourself. The greatest things have been done before forty years of age. Pascal at sixteen years of age; Grotius at seventeen; Romulus at twenty; Napoleon at twenty-two; Whitefield at twenty-four; Bonaparte at twenty-seven; Ignatius Loyola at thirty; Raphael at thirty-seven, having made the world feel their virtue or their vice. With the biggest strokes you will probably plead for the truth or against the truth will be before you reach the meridian of life. Don't wait for something to turn up. Go to work and turn it up. There is no such thing as good luck. No man that ever lived has had a better time than I have had; yet I never had any good luck. But instead there has a kind Providence has crowded my life with mercies. You will never accomplish much as long as you go at your work the minute you are expected, and stop the first minute it is lawful to quit. The greatly useful and successful men of the next century will be those who began an hour before they were required and worked at least half an hour after they might have quit. Unless you are willing sometimes to work twelve hours of the day, you will remain on the low levels, and your life will be a prolonged humdrum.

Word the next: Remember that it is only a small part of our life that we pass on earth. Less than your finger compared with your whole body is the life on earth when compared with the next life. I suppose there are not more than a dozen people in this world a hundred old But a very few people in any country rea eighty. The majority of the human rac expire before thirty. Now, what an equoise in such a consideration. If things go rong, it is only for a little while. Have yo not enough moral pluck to stand the josing, and the injustices, and the mishap of the small parenthesis between the twe ternities? It is a good thing to get rea for the one mile this side the marble sla but more important to get fixed up for the terminable miles which stretch out into t distances beyond the marble slab. A few ears ago on the Nashville and New Orins Railroad we were waked up early in t morning and told we must take carrias for some distance. "Why?" we all asld. But we soon saw for ourselves that wh the first four or five spans of the brie were up, further on there was a span thaad fallen, and we could not but shudder what might have been the possibilities. Wh your rail-train starts on a long bridge you want to be sure that the first span of the idge is all right, but what if further on ere is a span of the bridge that is all wreg; how then? what then? In one of the estern cities the freshets had carried awa a bridge, and a man knew that the expss train would soon come along. So he hted a lantern and started up the track to sp the train. But before he had got far enoh up the track the wind blew out the ligh of his lantern, and standing in the dar ess as the train came up, he threw the lantn into the locomotive, crying, Stop! Stol and the warning was in time to halt the ain. And if any of you by evil habits are astening on toward brink, or precipit or fallen span, I throw this Gospel lantn at your mad career: Stop! Stop! The end thereof is death! Young man, you are ged now by many environments, but you ill after a while get your wings out. Son one caged a Rocky Mountain eagle and ept him shut up between the wires until the spirit and courage had gone out of it. leased one day from the cage, the agi seemed to want to return to its former prist. The fact was that the eagle had all gone out of him. He kept his wings down. Aft ter a while he looked up at the sun, turning his head first this side and then that side and then spread one wing and then the ner wing, and began to mount, until he ds were far under his feet, and he was out sight in the empyrean. My brother, shevou leave this life, if by the grace of God ou are prepared, you will come out of the ge of this hindering mortality, and soaring up to the heavenly heights you will spre wing for immortal flight, leaving sun and moon, and stars beneath in your sce to glories that never fade, and splendors which never die. Your body is the cage Your soul is the eagle.

*"Immediately in response to the following letter, [illegible] the author, the subject being suggested by some sermons [illegible] Young Men's Christian Association, and by the publication of the [illegible] Young Men":

Wod the next: Fill yourself with biographs of men who did gloriously in the busiss, or occupation, or profession you are about to choose, or have already chosen. Going to be a merchant? Read up Peter Cooper, and Abbot Lawrence, and Jam Lenox, and William E. Dodge, and George Peabody. See how most of the merchants at the start munched their roomy luncheon made up of dry bread and hunk of cheese, behind a counter or in a storeroom, as they started in a business which brought them to the top of inmens which enabled them to bless the world with millions of dollars consecrated to hpitals, and schools, and churches, and private benefactions, where neither right hand nor left hand knew what the the hand did. Going to be a physician? Read up Harvey, and Grosse, and Sir Jodal Clarke, and James Y. Simpson, the discoverer of chloroform as an anæsthetic and all the other mighty physicians who have mended broken bones, and enthroned again deposed intellects, and given their lives to healing the long deep gash of the world's agony. Going to be a mechanic? Read up the inventions of sewing-machines, and cotton gins and life-saving apparatus, and the men who as architects, and builders, and manufacturers, and day laborers have made a life of thirty years in this century worth more than the full one hundred years of any other century. You six young men of Ohio, and all the other young men — instead of wasting your time on dry essays as to how to do great things, go to the biographical alcove of your village or city library, and acquaint yourselves with men who in the sight of earth, and heaven, and hell, did the great things. Remember, the greatest things are yet to be done. If the Bible be true, or as I had better put it, since the Bible is beyond all controversy true, the greatest battle is yet to be fought, and compared with it Saragossa, and Gettysburg, and Sedan were child's play with toy pistols. We even know the name of the battle, though we are not certain as to where it will be fought. I refer to Armageddon. The greatest discoveries are yet to be made. A scientist has recently discovered in the air something which will yet rival electricity. The most of things have not yet been found out. An explorer has recently found in the Valley of the Nile a whole fleet of ships buried ages ago where now there is no water. Only six out of the eight hundred grasses have been turned into food like the potato and the tomato. There are hundreds of other styles of food to be discovered. Aerial navigation will yet be made as safe as travel on the solid earth. Cancers, and consumptions, and leprosies are to be transferred from the catalogue of incurable diseases to the curable. Medical men are now successfully experimenting with modes of transferring diseases from weak constitutions which cannot throw them off, to stout constitutions which are able to throw them off. Worlds like Mars and the moon will be within hailing distance, and instead of confining our knowledge to their canals and their volcanoes, they will signal all styles of intelligence to us, and we will signal all styles of intelligence to them. Coming times will class our boasted nineteenth century with the dark ages. Under the power of Gospelization the world is going to be so improved that the sword and the musket of our time will be kept in museums as now we look at thumb-screws and ancient instruments of torture.

Oh, what opportunities you are going to have, young men all the world over, under thirty. How thankful you ought to be that you were not born any sooner. Blessed are the cradles that are being rocked now. Blessed are the students in the freshman class. Blessed those who will yet be young men when the new century comes in, in five or six years from now. This world was hardly fit to live in in the eighteenth century. I do not see how the old folks stood it. During this nineteenth century the world has by Christianizing and educational influences been fixed up until it does very well for temporary residence. But the twentieth century! Ah, that will be the time to see great sights, and do great deeds. Oh, young men, get ready for the rolling in of that mightiest, and grandest, and most glorious century that the world has ever seen! Only five summers more: five autumns more; five winters more; five springs more, and then the clock of time will strike the death of the old Century and the birth of the new. I do not know what sort of a December night it will be when this Century lies down to die; whether it will be starlit or tempestuous; whether the snows will be drifting, or the soft winds will breathe upon the pillow of the expiring centenarian. But millions will mourn its going, for many have received from it kindnesses innumerable, and they will kiss farewell the aged brow wrinkled with so many vicissitudes. Old Nineteenth Century of weddings and burials; of defeats and victories; of nations born and nations dead; thy pulses growing feebler now, will soon stop on that thirty-first night of December. But right beside it will be the infant Century, held up for baptism. Its smooth brow will glow with bright expectations. The then more than seventeen hundred million inhabitants of the earth will hail its birth and pray for its prosperity. Its reign will be for a hundred years, and the most of your life I think will be under the sway of its sceptre. Get ready for it. Have your heart right; your nerves right; your brain right; your digestion right. We will hand over to you our commerce, our mechanism, our arts and sciences, our professions, our pulpits, our inheritance. We believe in you. We trust you. We pray for you. We bless you. And though by the time you get into the thickest of the fight for God and righteousness, we may have disappeared from earthly scenes, we will not lose our interest in your struggle, and if the dear Lord will excuse us for a little while from the Temple Service and the House of Many Mansions, we will come out on the battlements of jasper, and cheer you, and perhaps if that night of this world be very quiet, you may hear our voices dropping from afar, as we cry, "Be thou faithful unto death, and thou shalt have a crown!"

MASTUJ, A FORT IN CHITRAL, SCENE OF A HEROIC RESCUE.

What is claimed to be the largest map in the world has been prepared by Rev. W. H. Waggoner, of the Yale Divinity School. It shows every point on the globe where missionaries are working, and is the first map of this character ever attempted. It was exhibited at the recent Christian Endeavor Convention in Cleveland, O.

England's War in India.

The Heroes who Relieved Chitral and Mastuj—A Record of Unselfish Bravery.

REFERENCE was made in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the military expedition to Chitral in Upper India, for the relief of Dr. Robertson, the British resident who, with his military escort, was surrounded and hemmed in by a large force of hostile Chitrali and other tribesmen, while Captain Bretherton, with another and still smaller force was imperiled at Mastuj, some forty miles further north. Details now received show that the flying column from Gilgit, under Colonel Kelly, which performed this hazardous task, accomplished a feat which for sheer bravery and unselfish heroism must be ranked among the valorous deeds of the century. Col. Kelly's command crossed the Shandur Pass, 12,000 feet high, amid heavy snow, the men themselves dragging the field-pieces, as the horses could not proceed. Further on in the mountains, at Gasht, they found that the tribesmen had gathered in force to oppose them, and had constructed "sangars," or stone breast-works. Col. Kelly's troops forded the Laspur River, before climbing the heights to reach the enemy's position, where a sharp fight took place, the enemy only yielding after a stubborn resistance. The road to Mastuj was then comparatively clear, and after relieving Captain Bretherton and his handful of followers, the Gilgit column, without stopping, continued its victorious march in the direction of Chitral. Near Sanoghar, it encountered a strong force of the enemy in a deep gorge, or nullah, with steep cliffs on either side rising to a height of 250 feet. Here, behind strong sangars, and armed with modern rifles, 1500 tribesmen made a desperate stand against Col. Kelly's column of about six hundred Indian troops, but the momentum of the victorious troops was irresistible, and they forced their way through, a small detachment making a flank attack upon the enemy while the main column swept onward, its machine guns and rifles emitting such a hail of fire and bullets as it passed that the tribesmen, who were commanded by leaders of rank, retreated in utter confusion. The column reached Chitral soon afterward and relieved Dr. Robertson and his command, who had been beleaguered forty-five days. When the larger relieving force of 15,000 men under Gen. Low arrived from Peshawur many days later, they found to their surprise that the work was already accomplished. The men of Gilgit, with their heroic leader, had performed a feat unsurpassed in bravery by any in the records of the British wars in India.

Mastuj, which is shown in the illustration on this page, will be memorable as being near the place where a British troop under Capt. Ross was lately annihilated by the Chitralis. It is a lonely fort, in the mountainous region of Upper India, which marks the division between the English and Russian Asiatic frontiers. The Chitral troubles, however, are by no means ended with the capture of these two strongholds.

JESUS ON THE CROSS.

S. S. Lesson for May 26. Mark 15: 22-37. Golden Text Rom. 5: 5. By Mrs. Baxter.

"WE preach a Messiah crucified, unto Jews a stumbling block, unto Gentiles foolishness, but unto them that are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God" (I. Cor. 1: 23, 24, R.V., margin). "A Messiah crucified!" "The Hope of Israel" (Jer. 14: 8), "who was to be the King in his beauty" (Isa. 33: 17); "the King who should reign in righteousness" (Isa. 32: 1); "the glorious Lord . . . our Judge . . . our Lawgiver . . . our King; he shall save us" (Isa. 33: 21, 22). How should he be crucified? No death of shame was so shameful as the death of the cross; how then should he, whom the Jews were looking for as "the Lord our Righteousness," be associated with all that speaks of the grossest sin, and which is the result of judgment upon a criminal? It was "a stumbling block" to the self-righteous Jew, whose pride was in his close observance of the law, and his descent from Abraham, God's friend; it was "foolishness" to the cultured Greek, whose art and poetry had invested human nature with an ideal divinity and refinement which was shocked at the very mention of the cross.

Condemned without proof of guilt, yet making no defence, the silence of Jesus in such circumstances, awaking the unfeigned surprise of the chief priests, king, and ruler, Jesus was led away to be crucified. To all appearance his cause was at an end, and his holy life of blessing to others seemed to end in failure. To all appearance the chief priests and elders of the people, with the enemy of souls inciting them, had gained the day, and the Object of their envy was about to be hushed forever. But O how astounded would they have been had they perceived what the Holy Ghost afterwards revealed to the little assembly of believers after Pentecost, that they who fondly imagined that victory was theirs, were only accomplishing that which the hand and counsel of God "determined before should be done" (Acts 4: 28). All their rage and fury, all their murderous hate, was hastening the moment when that crucified One shall come again in glory to judge every man according to his works?

Having tired of mocking him, who, like a patient lamb, took all from the hand of his Father, and neither looked nor spoke anything of retaliation; the soldiers charged with his execution took off Jesus the regal garments with which they had invested him in derision, and putting again his own clothes on him, they led him away to crucify him. Not one disciple, even of the chosen twelve, not one of the thousands which had reaped blessing from his hand, was there to stand by him—to belong to the Crucified. And he manifested no wounded feeling that his followers should fail him now, the infinite patience he had ever shown, the love of his own, "even unto the end" (John 13: 1), did not break down under this tremendous test. What is the secret? He dealt with man by faith. He trusted in God, and his trust was as much for his disciples as for aught else. Had he taken into account what they were, and how they had failed him, it would have been high time to ex[illegible] and to deplore them of [illegible]. But he knew [illegible] would learn of their own failure at such a time [illegible] brought to light and cured; the utter unreliability of human nature. He "considered even the flesh," [illegible] the cross the purest flesh [illegible] and delivering it over unto death, "that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in such as walk, not after the flesh, but after the Spirit."

The agony in Gethsemane had told upon his physical frame. It was the custom of the condemned to carry to the place of execution the cross on which they were to suffer. But a far heavier load, the weight of every man's sin with all the evil motives which led to words and actions, and even the sin of nature inherited from Adam, all lay with crushing weight upon the heart of God's Son, and our great High Priest, as he was led out by sinful men to suffer, though they knew it not, for them. And strength failed him, so that the soldiers seized on a passer by, Simon the Cyrenian, and compelled him to bear the cross after Jesus. And in the place of common execution Golgotha, where the unburied bones of former criminals lay whitening as a warning to evil doers, he who "knew no sin" was crucified. It was man's estimate of God, for God was manifested in Christ, it was God's estimate of sin, that he could permit him to be made sin for us; a lesser sacrifice could not have sufficed. It was indeed the wisdom of God that by such a means his mercy could reach every child of man who should believe in him, without, in one iota, infringing his holy unspotted justice. And not only does he cancel condemnation in his perfect righteousness and justice through the death of Jesus, he does far more, he gives to each repentant and believing sinner a new life, the very life of Christ, eternal life, so that he not only ought to, but can live in newness of life.

But how few there are who understand and enter into this! How few there are who really do look upon their old man, i.e. their former life and character and nature before they were converted, as being really crucified with Christ! How many seek to fight their old nature on the one hand, or admire it and indulge it on the other! How many seek to improve it, and how many again pity themselves for having such a nature! All this is a want of trust in God, a real unbelief in the work of Christ on the cross. There are very many who believe that through him all that believe are justified and that in him we "have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins." But while they believe this on no other evidence than the Word of God, brought home to them by the power of the Holy Ghost, they pass over, without taking it for themselves, that our old man was crucified with Christ, that the body of sin might be done away, that so we should no longer be in bondage to sin. The one Scripture they believe and act upon; the other they may contend about, but do not really take by faith, and so live in the power of it. Consequently they find themselves still in bondage to sin, and their bodies remain bodies of sin instead of being instruments of righteousness to God.

If I take by faith in God's Word, that I am accepted in the Beloved, and that in him I have redemption through his blood even the forgiveness of sins, then doubts about acceptance or forgiveness cannot, and do not, trouble me. "It is written" suffices. If I, as surely, believe that my old man, i.e. what I was before I believed, was crucified with Christ, with the very purpose of bringing over my body from the service of sin to the service of God, the very position which I take by faith alters the aspect of all which used to affect me. Just as a doubt of pardon is met instantaneously by: God says I have redemption, the forgiveness of sins, just so an attempt of the enemy to wound me is met by the Word. God says I am crucified with Christ; I sign my name to his word and my own death-warrant, now, Satan, you have to do with one whom God says is crucified. No matter how I feel, if God says I am forgiven, I am forgiven; if God says I have died with Christ, I have died. I hold to this Word against myself, and against the enemy. As long as we doubt the pardon which our beloved Lord procured for us upon the cross, we are as badly off personally as though he had not died for us.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

EACH of the four evangelists gives details which need to be woven into a complete story of the crucifixion. No time appears to have been lost in hurrying forward the execution, after Pilate had given his consent. It was probably nine o'clock in the morning of April 7, A. D., 30. The place of execution was about a mile away from Pilate's palace, if, as is generally believed, Calvary is identical with the hill outside the north wall of the city, where the cave known as Jeremiah's grotto is. Along that path, Jesus, according to the usual custom, must carry the cross on which he is to die. But exhausted by the conflict in Gethsemane and the scourging, he falters under the weight of the timber. The crowd is impatient of the slow progress, and seizing the first man whom they met, who according to tradition, was a negro, afterward a Christian, they compel him to carry the cross. The usual custom was to lay it on the ground, nail the victim to it, and then raise it to an upright position, with its foot in the hole prepared for it. The feet of the sufferer were only a foot of two above the ground, and he could thus speak to those about him. It was a slow, lingering death. Sometimes the suffering lasted for two days or more, before death put an end to it. There was a slight projection on the upright beam, on which the victim sat, so that his weight might not tear the hands from the nails. Little mercy was shown to the condemned, but some wealthy ladies of the city were in the habit of providing a draught of stupefying drugs, which was mercifully given as an anæsthetic. But this Jesus refused to take when he tasted it. Two other executions were to take place that morning, probably the men being two of those implicated in the outbreak of Barabbas. The coarse soldiery having done their work, parted the garments, and finding one [illegible] was better than the others, drew lots [illegible], and then sat down to watch the death [illegible] nies. Over the head of Christ a [illegible] written by Pilate was affixed. It [illegible] stated that this was the king of the [illegible]. It was a taunt which was keenly f[illegible] by the priests and leaders. They were [illegible] nant, and went to Pilate to have it cha[illegible] ed; but he refused, and his curt refusal sl[illegible] ed that he was glad that the barb ra[illegible] ed. There were many going and comin[illegible] nto the city at that festive time, and as [illegible] ney passed the dying men they taunte[illegible] the chief sufferer. But Jesus made no rejo[illegible] ler. Seven times during those six hou[illegible] he spoke, and from his utterances we [illegible] ter what was passing in his mind. Th[illegible] rst, spoken probably when the cross was [illegible] ted and when the suffering would be e[illegible] uci-ating, was a plea for the soldiers, as [illegible] he feared that God would strike them d[illegible] for their cruelty. They did not kno[illegible] —let their ignorance plead for them—let th[illegible] be forgiven. In that awful hour Chris[illegible] ould intercede for them. The second utt[illegible] ance was in response to the thief at his sid[illegible] who either from previous knowledge, [illegible] the spectacle of patient suffering that m[illegible] ment perceived Christ's superiority and be[illegible] ught his good offices. As the time d[illegible] gged wearily on, Jesus, looking around, [illegible] cognized his mother in the crowd and w[illegible] ner, John, Mary Magdalene and other t[illegible] men. He realizes that this involves his m[illegible] er's bereavement, and briefly but tender[illegible] ly mits her to John's care. Then an [illegible] ful agony seems to have passed throu[illegible] his soul. No longer can he find the [illegible] peace that has been with him heretofore in [illegible] crisis, and the loss is very bitter. "[illegible] God," he cries, "why hast thou fo[illegible] me?" Probably he swooned after [illegible] iable cry, for his next word is wrun[illegible] from him by physical suffering. He s[illegible] thirst," and they gave him vine[illegible] some sour wine. Gave him to drink. The agony o[illegible] was one of the most painful acco[illegible] ments of crucifixion. Dr. Stalker sa[illegible] remember talking with a German [illegible] who had served in the Franco-P[illegible] war. He was wounded in an enga[illegible] near Paris, and lay on the field un[illegible] stir. He did not know exactly wh[illegible] the nature of his wound, and he t[illegible] that he might be dying. The pain [illegible] tense; the wounded and dying were [illegible] ing round about him; the battle w[illegible] raging, and shots were falling and [illegible] up the ground in all directions. B[illegible] a time one agony, he told me, be[illegible] swallow up all the rest, and soon m[illegible] forget his wound, his danger, and hi[illegible] bors. It was the agony of thirst. BRINGING IN THE SHEAVES.

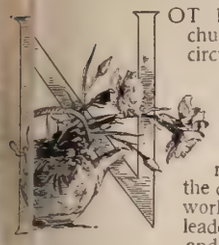
What is to be Done with the Millions who do not go to Church? — How are they to be Reached?

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, by JOSEPH COOK, Boston.



NOT by making church services a circus. Not by diluting and distorting Christian doctrine. Not by compromises between the church and the world. Not by the leadership of wealth and fashion. Not by importing novelties in methods or doctrine. Not by supine waiting for providential upheavals in an irreligious community. Not by following the clannish preference of any one class that claims the right to guide the church, whether they are the young, or those in middle life or the aged, laymen or preachers, educated or uneducated.

Only by a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together, on the part of God's people, and of the Holy Spirit, and of the Biblical truths, including the severe as well as the tender inculcations of Scripture, can a careless community be made vitally religious. Among the instrumentalities which the history of the churches in recent years shows to have been greatly effective in bringing into the new life those who have neglected their duty, I mention fifteen, but without deciding which, in any given case, should be placed in the front rank, when aggressive Christianity resolves to leaven any special community. All these measures may have been repeatedly blessed of God, but the proper combination of them is to be learned only through watchfulness, prayer and practical experience in each case of spiritual declension, the reversal of which may always be hopefully sought when the forces act together:

1. Neighborhood prayer-meetings—very numerous and scattered through the entire community. The faithful Christians who are the leaven of both rural and city populations are to be taught to lead such meetings as a part of their most solemn duties and privileges. Of course much secret prayer must go before these social gatherings if the leaders are to be endued with power from on high. The effectiveness of such neighborhood prayer-meetings has been tested again and again by wise pastors and evangelists. Christians in a torpid state drop their lethargy if once they can be induced to take sufficient spiritual exercise. Nothing quickens a soul more than its effort to quicken another soul. No secrets can be kept between neighbors confederated in religious work. The whole tone of a community is lifted when neighborhood prayer-meetings have quickened the consciences, and rectified the lives of those who profess to be Christians. It is of subtle importance to have each class in the community reached religiously by members of its own circle. Lawyers speak best to lawyers, merchants to merchants, mechanics to mechanics, farmers to farmers, young men to young men, young women to young women. There are several evangelists who will not undertake special religious services in any community until it has first been saturated for weeks by the Waters of Life which flow from the head-springs of that high tableland of self-surrender to God, which is reached by neighborhood prayer-meetings, even if only two or three in each are gathered together in Christ's name.

2. Union of the evangelical churches in common effort to bring out the whole community, and with utter obliteration of all merely denominational lines, while the most special efforts are made for the salvation of souls, is a measure that has often been greatly fruitful in drawing the spiritually careless into God's house. No evangelist ought to undertake to labor for a religious revival in any town without first securing such a union of the evangelical churches. There are no differences of importance in the central doctrines in Protestant evangelical denominations. Their preachable theology answers in identically the same way the question, What must I do to be saved? Of course a distinction exists between the various Protestant bodies in methods of church government, and as to some minor doctrines, but these divergences should be overlooked and submerged when the effort to reach a religiously-indifferent community is to be made successful. When Christians stand shoulder to shoulder they are seen to be stronger than non-Christians usually imagine. The churches, like a Macedonian phalanx, are invincible only when they march with shield joined to shield along the whole battle-front of their regiments.

3. Visitation from house to house by the most spiritual Christians until the entire community is reached, is a measure absolutely indispensable in either the city or the country side, if the masses are all to be brought within hearing of the Gospel. Dr. Chalmers, chiefly by this method, changed the West Port, one of the worst quarters of Edinburgh, into a community of self-supporting religious and industrial institutions. It is exceedingly important that this work should not be left wholly to pastors and city missionaries, however precious and indispensable their activities may be.

4. Preachers of a bold, sensible and defensible orthodoxy, avoiding eccentricities of both manner and matter, speaking always in the Biblical tone, and everywhere making vital religion a practical matter. No man is fit to be a preacher who is not willing to echo God. Every sermon should be a chain of unanswerable, Biblical truths, and every such chain will be chain-lightning. It is not only evident, but it is also strictly self-evident, that without deliverance from the love of sin and the guilt of it, no soul can be at peace in life or death, or beyond death in presence of infinite holiness. The necessity of this double deliverance must be taught on the basis of axiomatic certainties, both Scriptural and scientific. The New Birth and the Atonement are the only possible solutions of the problems of man's colossal spiritual necessities. It is certain, also, that all character tends to a final permanence, and that, in the very nature of things, a final permanence can come but once. Those who delay repentance long enough are sure to drift into a state, in which although freedom remains, repentance will not occur; and without repentance there can be no salvation. It is the conviction of orthodox churches that the Scriptures teach that probation is limited to this life, and this stupendous truth must be taught with Biblical emphasis, or else all preaching becomes like sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. No community can ever be religiously regenerated by a devitalized orthodoxy.

REV. JOSEPH COOK, LL.D.

5. Theological teachers of the right sort, it need not be said, are necessary to the instruction and training of preachers of the right sort. Many great theological professors like a Schleiermacher, a Tholuck, a Chalmers, or a Park, Phelps, Shedd, Hodge, have been great preachers. But it is the severe truth that some theological professors are not great preachers themselves, and so are poorly equipped for the work of preparing preachers for their duties in the churches. It is useful to know when you listen to any religious teacher what guidance he has had and reveres the most. Unless the Scriptures and the Holy Spirit palpably lead him, no matter what human masters he may have had, he ought not to be allowed to lead others. When the blind lead the blind they both, even in modern days, fall into the ditch.

6. Evangelists of the right sort achieve the best spiritual successes only in connection with aggressive churches led by preachers of the right sort. There are many types of evangelists. There has been wild-fire at different periods scattered through the churches by religious leaders who were mis-leaders. Nevertheless, it is the glory of American Protestant Christianity, that it has developed, by the Divine blessing, a series of evangelists who have been evidently crowned from high. The names of Jonathan Edwards, Nettleton, Lyman Beecher, Finney, Earle, Moody, Munhall, Mills, and of many more to say nothing of Wesley and Whitefield, sent to us from beyond seas, are held in devout honor in all churches of vitally orthodox faith. Whom God crowns, let no man try to discrown. These men are not denominationalists or sectarians in any sense, but apostles of the strategic and commanding evangelical verities. Again and again their ministrations have awakened whole communities and made even the dry bones in our modern Valleys of Vision to take on the clothing of life, stand upon their feet, and become permanently formidable regiments in the Lord's hosts.

7. Young People's Christian Endeavor is a whole constellation of stars of hope in the recent history of religiously neglected populations. A Society of world-wide activity and inestimable usefulness has suddenly sprung into existence and already effected really great results, which, however, are only the buds and promises of what ought to be, under Divine guidance, its future achievements. The work of this Society can be adjusted to the needs of both rural and urban populations. In towns of any considerable size, Young Men's Christian Associations are of incalculable value, and ought to have before them a career dazzling even their past brilliant record of usefulness.

8. Sunday Schools ought to be made to embrace the entire younger population of every community. With the International Lesson papers and the multitude of aids provided by expert writers, there ought now to be no great difficulty in securing sound instruction even in obscure schools. It ought to be considered a moral and intellectual disgrace to any family not to send its children to Sabbath School.

9. Distribution of religious literature may be made vastly effective, even in spiritually torpid populations, if accompanied by house to house visitation, and adequately thorough Sunday School instruction. The churches ought to feel it to be one of their most solemn duties to bring religious literature within reach of the whole community.

10. Philanthropic activity on the part of the churches, with sound and aggressive teaching concerning moral reforms, is indispensable to the maintenance of the spiritual ascendancy of the pulpits, not only among those who hear the voice of the living preacher, but also and especially among those who hear only its echoes. A manly courage, a resonant and incisive intonation on the part of the churches in discussing vital reforms, attracts most of the people who are not church members, and who are sure to cite any cowardice of the church in secular duties as evidence of insincerity or intellectual weakness.

11. A variety of services meeting the wants of varied classes of the population, has not been sufficiently cultivated by many churches. If a preacher now and then were to give a question-box lecture, or a prelude on current reform, or hold a gathering for social purposes preceding a preaching service on a week-day evening, the result might be spiritually remunerative, both to himself and his hearers. Services largely interspersed with music are common enough, but are not the only examples of profitable diversification of the usual routine.

12. Inquiry meetings following revival discourses are among the supreme blessings for both church members and the religiously irresolute. Most evangelists employ such meetings as the rear-guards of their entire work as preachers, but every pastor and all church members ought to know how to use effectively these crowning opportunities of spiritual warfare. It is endlessly important to address religious truth not only to the intellect, but also to the will. Church members must be instructed how to lead the unconverted to an immediate decision to accept God, or God in Christ, as both Saviour and Lord.

13. Family worship and the religious education of children day by day in their homes are necessary to the success of the church in reaching the entire circle of its own members and thus preserving in the community a diffused religious vitality through which those who are not church members may be attracted to the religious life. A dwelling without a family altar in it may be a house but can never be a home. Now that any distinctively religious instruction and even the reading of the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment, are excluded from the common schools of so many more or less misguided American Commonwealths, it is more important than ever that religious instruction of children should be undertaken by parents at the family altar and not carelessly committed to Sunday Schools, with their brief weekly opportunities.

14. To keep the Lord's Day holy is a duty of divine and perpetual obligation. The Constitution of the United States protects the President in his weekly day of rest. He has ten days, "Sundays excepted," in which to consider a Bill before giving to it or withholding from it his signature. Every working man in the Republic ought to be protected as thoroughly as is the President in his right to rest one day in seven. Encroachments on Sabbath sanctity undermine high civilization. Charles Sumner was accustomed to say: "If we would preserve our political liberties, we must sanctify as well as fortify the Republic, making it at once citadel and temple." Emerson calls Sunday "the core of civilization." Oliver Wendell Holmes wrote the exceedingly significant line:

He who ordained the Sabbath loved the poor.

Overworked men naturally neglect the churches and use Sundays almost exclusively for rest. If the whole population is to be reached by regenerating religious influences, the people must be taught by both precept and example that worship as well as rest on one day in seven is divinely ordained as a universal human duty, works of necessity and mercy always excepted.

15. The Holy Spirit brooding upon the chaos of our modern life and using all truth Biblical and scientific, as a method of self-revelation, is alone competent to organize Eden or bring in the dawn of the millennial day. Only when the churches are administered by the Spirit will they be found equal to the conquest of the whole world. But when thus administered the visible church may lead the entire population to spiritual, industrial, intellectual, and political levels never yet reached in history except by small fragments of the race. The Holy Spirit in the churches and in all devout souls is the King immortal, invisible, eternal, who should be the administrator of all the affairs of humanity. To reach the whole people with vital religious influences it is necessary for the churches to transmute the whole Bible into victorious life in the Spirit.

WHAT DO YOU EAT?

THE adulteration of food is startling. It seems that those of us who thought we had a respectable diet have been eating and drinking things that may not be mentioned. Honest old-fashioned butter has melted and run out of the world, and instead thereof we have trichinosis in all styles served up morning, noon and night. All the ailments of the brute creation set before us in raw state, or done up in puddings and pies and gravies. The wonders and mysteries and incomprehensibilities of hotel hash eclipsed by this blissful conglomeration. Even the candies that we bring home to our children are, under chemical analysis, found to be crystallized disease. Lozenges of red-lead and sweetened death. Coffees and teas, the innocuous beverages of millions, are so depraved that we feel like saying with Charles Lamb, when an unseemly mixture was placed before him: "If this be coffee, give me tea, and if this be tea, give me coffee." Even the medicines to which we appeal in time of dire distress, through apothecarial admixture fail us, and kill when they ought to cure. Alas! for the alum in the bread, and the chalk in the milk, and the glass in the sugar, and the Venetian-red in the cocoa, and the heaven knows what in the syrup. If a man not at all bigoted, but very liberal on the subject of temperance, and of the high license persuasion, wants to imbibe some inspiration to help him fight down the fanaticism of prohibition, and he goes up to the counter and pays for supposed liquor, he swallows and smacks his lips over coculus indicus, and potash, and cochineal, and blue vitriol, and other delectables—some of these things put in the beverage to make it hot, and some to make it red, and some to make it mix, and some to counteract the fatality of others.

But what is worse, adulteration has got into religion, and the bread of life has been evilly tinctured, and the pure milk of the Word watered. Free grace is the divine provision for the human family on their repentance and faith. In our time we mix it all up. A little grace will do with a decoction of humanitarianism added, and a few grains of spiritualism, and a liberal sprinkling of worldly philosophy, and a decided coloring of art making it vermilion or ultramarine, and then we take the tongs of the altar and stir it up and stir it down, and mix it in and mix it out, until much of the [illegible] is [illegible] and death, instead of life.

[illegible] is the curse of the Church of Jesus Christ in our day. There will never be any improvement on the old Gospel. Everything added weakens its [illegible]. What the need of [illegible] Bible pharmacy in order to cure its disorders, and not the world's quackery. What it wants to feed its spiritual hunger is not the cake of human confection, which may please the taste while it gives no muscle to the spiritual character, but the strong meat of the Word and the bread of which if a man eat he shall never hunger. Away with the adulteration of food and medicine from your groceries and drug stores, and away with spiritual adulteration from the churches and theological seminaries. If we should all go back to primitive Christianity, the progress of the Gospel, which is rapid now, would be a hundredfold accelerated. We want less of these modern admixtures, less of the Gospel Darwinian, and more of the Gospel Pauline. Our modern religion has not enough backbone to stand alone. It must lean against the gate of the university, or it flops right over. The old religion could stand alone and defiant of all assailment. It made no apologies, and it offered no compromise. Unadulterated Christianity is going to save this world, and save it sooner than some of you have any idea. You know we used to say in the country when we saw certain streaks in the sky reaching up to the sun, "The sun's drawing water," and we expected rain the next day or the day after. The Sun of Righteousness has for ages been gathering up the tears of the faithful: the sun has been drawing water. What does it mean? It means showers of mercy, rain of righteousness, deluge of salvation. Oh! if only in our day the Lord would strike for the disenthrallment of this suffering human race. Oh! that with these very eyes, with which we have seen so many of the woes of the nations, we might see their redemption. Oh! if with these very ears, with which we have heard the shriek, the groan, the heart-break, the agonies of time, we might hear the jubilate of a ransomed world. Oh! if with these very hands, with which we have tried to pull along the chariot of a Saviour's conquest, we might wave the palm at the consummation. But dear and gracious Lord, let it be in thine own time, and in thine own way, and we shall be satisfied.

THE FACE OF AUDIENCES.

AN eminent lecturer declares that all audiences are about alike to him. He enters at eight o'clock the public hall, and finds a circle of humanity coiled around him just like the one he saw in some other hall on the previous night. Our experience is different. We find no two audiences alike. Each one is as different from all the others as one man's face varies from another's physiognomy. Some audiences are dull. In that village we find poor schools, or stupid churches, or unenterprising newspapers. Everything is profoundly silent save as a cough or a sneeze interrupts one. The stolidity of the assembly reacts upon the lecturer. While you are speaking you look at your watch. You begin to measure off your lecture with less interest than the merchant measures a yard of cassimere. You say to yourself, "Half through!" "Three-fourths through!" "Five minutes more and I may quit!" And you close your manuscript, shake hands with the treasurer, and go out. At another place the audience beams upon you as you enter. Everybody seems to say, "Welcome to our town! We are all waiting for you. Now do your best. If you have any wisdom of wit, fling it over this way." Your smallest joke goes off like a pack of Fourth of July fire-crackers. You are amazed to see how people take things. Your poorest lecture catches enthusiasm from the good-natured audience. You feel as if you were in your own parlor talking with a group of college chums. The hour-and-a-half seems to you only like twenty minutes, and after shaking hands with men, women and children, you are so well pleased, that the commercial part of your engagement seems most insignificant. You got your pay before you came to the peroration. Let audiences know that oft-times they are responsible for the stupidity of a speaker. The attempt to build a fire among green wood make a smoke, but no blaze.

CONGRATULATIONS.

MANY of the denominations of Christians are now in annual convocation. The toilers in the different fields are talking together of the prospects of the harvest, and counting the sheaves already garnered. So the work goes on. Infidels deride, and atheists laugh, and Satan and his cohorts applaud opposition; but Christ is to govern this round world from Arctic to Antarctic. If God could make this world in six days, I think he can make it over again in six days. It does not take a watch-maker longer to repair a watch than it took him originally to construct it. When Christ rides down for the final conquest of the nations, his chariot wheels will roll so fast you cannot count the revolutions. Let no shadow of discouragement ever cross your mind. Toil on in brightest expectation, by so much that you believe that God is true, and able to fulfil his promise, "Every valley shall be exalted; and every mountain and hill shall be made low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain; and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed; and all nations shall see it together, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Mrs Isaac Martin, Pittsburg, Pa. How many pastors, churches, and communicants are there in the United States at the present time, and which of the Protestant denominations has the largest following?

According to the eleventh census, there were 108,879 preachers, 142,378 churches, and 20,661,046 communicants, or about one-third of the entire population. The Methodist denomination leads the Protestant list with 4,589,284.

Jessie Denton, Leavenworth, Kan. Please explain why Japan is called "Little," when she is big enough to whip China and strong enough to defy Russia?

Japan is not quite so small as many published articles would seem to imply. Her territorial area is 147,655 square miles, which is considerably larger than that of Great Britain; she has 41,000,000 subjects — a larger number than either Italy or Britain can boast. She is only small in point of territory and population when compared with China.

H. M. T., Bethany, Neb. What were the Baptism and form of doctrine referred to in Romans 6: 3, 4, 17, 18?

Both were those that Paul preached everywhere: salvation by believing in Christ, and public confession of him by baptism. He was reminding the church at Rome that the life of the convert after his baptism should be as new a life as it would be if he had died and risen again. The whole chapter is an elaboration of the central thought of the epistle which is the power of Christian doctrine in the heart to produce righteousness of life.

F. W. O., Mooresville, Tenn. Do students of prophecy believe that the people who die without accepting Christ will have another opportunity during his millennial reign?

No; the majority believe that none of those who have died impenitent prior to his coming to establish his millennial kingdom will be alive on earth during his reign. The resurrection at his coming will be only of the righteous dead, and the general resurrection will not take place until the end of the Millennium. (See Rev. 20: 5.)

L. A. K., Elkhart, Ind. Is the use of fermented wine at the communion in accordance with the teaching of Christ?

There is no record of Christ having said anything on the subject. The broad principles he laid down, however, apply to many questions that at that time were not pressing. Concern for the welfare of others he certainly regarded as a duty. That concern at the present time may surely take into account the position of a man who was formerly a drunkard, and who may find his desire for intoxicants aroused by tasting fermented wine at communion. Sympathy with him and a desire to shield him from temptation, and save him from the pain of a struggle with his old enemy, is thus in accord with Christ's principles, and may legitimately find expression in using unfermented wine at the sacrament.

R. W. J. Vermilion Grove, Ill. 1. When were the various books of the Bible collected into one volume as we have it now? 2. Does the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews mean to 26 that a Christian rejects it he sin wilfully?

1. The collection of the books of the Old Testament was practically complete about a hundred years before Christ, but there were disputes as to whether Esther, Ecclesiastes, and Solomon's Song should be retained in the collection. Of the New Testament books, a list is in existence prepared in 180, which contains most of those now in our Testaments, and others since rejected as of doubtful authenticity. A list made in 360 is identical with ours, omitting, however, Revelation. Augustine's list in 430 enumerates the collection as we have it. No, it means that nothing more can be done for him. There could be no other sacrifice than the atonement of Jesus did not avail to save him from wilful sin, but he might still find that and find forgiveness under it if he repented.

M. E. S., Scranton, Pa. Do not the revisers of the Bible incur the penalty mentioned in Rev. . . by omitting Matt. 18: 11 and other passages?

The penalty you refer to cannot apply to the whole Bible, as the Gospel of John and probably one or more of his epistles were not written at the time the penalty was put in the Revelation. Besides, the revisers found that the passages omitted were not contained in the oldest manuscripts, but had been interpolated, so that if the penalty applied to anyone it would be to the interpolator, not to the revisers.

W. A. G., Collegne, Minn. 1. Paul describes the history of Hagar as an allegory: was it not . . . 2. What lesson did Christ intend to teach in the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus?

1. The Revised Version renders the expression, "which things contain an allegory," and this is doubtless the correct rendering. This does not impugn the literal truth of the narrative, but uses the facts as an illustration of the lesson he is trying to teach. If a father were very severe with a grown-up son, having him as a child, and some one who knew that a rupture between the two would result went to the father and talked to him about the Revolutionary war, the father would be trying to see the point of the allegory without realizing his friend doubted the historical facts. There were several. One was that wealth and ease were not an indication of bliss hereafter. A second that a man did not make a right use of his wealth who was indifferent to the poor. A third that awful consequence would result from neglect of the teachings of God's Word.

George C. Little, Pittstown, N. J. 1. Is it true that the coin which is mentioned in Genesis as Exodus as a shekel did not exist until several hundred years after Moses was dead? . . . 2. Is it true that all intelligent theologians now believe that Moses did not write the first five books of the Bible?

1. The shekel is not referred to as a coin but as a weight. In the earliest reference (Gen. 23: 16), it is explicitly stated that the shekel of silver "were weighed." In the clay tablets of Assyria there is mention of payments of money specified by weight. The shekel doubtless existed as a recognized standard of value long before there was a coin of that name. . . . 2. Many intelligent theologians agree that Moses did not write the last chapter of Deuteronomy, which contains the story of his death. They differ as to what other parts of the five books were or were not written by him.

W. B. D., Manley, Neb. 1. In close communion churches of the Baptist denomination, are members of sister churches excluded from the communion? 2. Was it at the last supper on the night of the betrayal, or at an earlier one at Bethany, that Christ washed the disciples' feet?

1. In all the close communion churches of which we have knowledge, a visitor belonging to any other Baptist Church would be welcomed to the Lord's Table. A member of a Congregational, Presbyterian, or any other church which Baptism by immersion is not practised would be excluded. 2. The majority of Baptist scholars are now of opinion that it was at the last supper that Jesus washed the disciples' feet. The discussion has been carried on for centuries, and some still think that the supper John describes was an earlier one.

Inquirer, Shreveport, La. 1. Is the recently published account of the life of Issa, a real or pretended account of a portion of our Saviour's earthly life? 2. What are the evidences, pro and con, of his life and miracles, entirely outside of what we find in the Gospels?

1. It is not accepted as authentic by any Biblical scholars of eminence. 2. There are many distinguished writers, historians and others, who refer to him. These include Tacitus, (whose passage concerning Jesus has never been contested), Josephus, Tertullian, and Celsus; yet neither Josephus nor Celsus were Christians. Tertullian, in an address to the Jews of his own time, remarks that even they (the Jews), admitted that Christ performed miracles. Celsus, in his written attacks on Jesus, conceded the miracles, but attributed them to magic. Besides these and others who might be named, the Talmud says that Jesus performed wondrous works, but asserts that they were done by the exercise of occult power. The Toldas Jeschu, another recognized Jewish work, admits that Christ raised the dead.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

NICARAGUA'S DIFFICULTY.

CORINTO, one of the ports on the Pacific coast of Nicaragua has suddenly sprung into international prominence during the past few weeks. The latest news we have, indicates that the difficulty which [illegible] it out of obscurity has been satisfac[illegible] solved, but for a time it seemed likely [illegible] olve a great deal of unpleasantness. [illegible]g the troubles arising out of the Mos[illegible] question, the Nicaraguan government, [illegible] standing perfectly well that England's [illegible]tle on the question was opposed to [illegible], took summary measures to over-ride [illegible]sition. Mr. Hatch, the British Vice-[illegible]l at Bluefields, together with some [illegible]y British subjects were seized and ta[illegible] Managua, the capital, where they [illegible]mprisoned. Apart from the original [illegible]ct of dispute about the Mosquito region, [illegible]as an affront which England was like[illegible]esent. Her extensive trade and her [illegible]pread colonial interests render it a ne[illegible]y that her representatives abroad [illegible]ld not be subject to personal indignity. [illegible]nand for reparation was accordingly [illegible] on Nicaragua. It finally took the [illegible] of a claim for damages which were [illegible]ssed at $75,000. The Nicaraguan gov[illegible]nt protested against the claim and [illegible]sed that it be submitted to arbitration. [illegible]nd, however, insisted that it was not [illegible] for arbitration, as there was no dis[illegible]about the facts, nor as to the treatment [illegible] Consul being a violation of interna[illegible] law. As there seemed to be no dis[illegible]on on the part of Nicaragua to yield, [illegible]e British government determined to take [illegible]ession of a Nicaraguan port and collect [illegible]e customs duties there, at the rates impos[illegible] the Nicar[illegible] govern[illegible] until a suf[illegible] sum had [illegible] received to [illegible]harge the [illegible]sh claim and [illegible]ests of col[illegible]ch. The Nic[illegible]an govern[illegible] appear to [illegible] hoped that the [illegible]nited States [illegible]ld regard [illegible] a proceed[illegible]g as a violation [illegible]e Monroe doc[illegible]ne, which [illegible]s any seiz[illegible]re of territory [illegible]e American [illegible]ntinent by a European power, an act of [illegible]sity to the United States. The hope [illegible]d vain. The Washington Govern[illegible]t had the assurance that England was [illegible]eizing territory, but merely sequestrating [illegible]e income of the Nicaraguan governme[illegible], and did not regard the case as calling [illegible]rts interference. England carried out [illegible]reat and, choosing Corinto as the port [illegible]adapted for the purpose, took possession [illegible] of the Custom House there. No opposition was offered and the occupation was [illegible]ably effected. The moral effect on the [illegible]ple, however, was injurious to the Government and after the British had been in possession a few days an undertaking was given to pay the money, the Republic of Salvador becoming security for the payment. Thereupon the British force was withdrawn and the incident closed. Several newspapers and some of our politicians have blamed our Government for not interfering to protect Nicaragua, but there seems to have been no just ground for interference, as the Monroe doctrine was not infringed. The Government certainly can claim that it followed the maxim of the wise king:

It is an honor for a man to keep aloof from strife: but every fool will be meddling. (Prov. 20: 3.)

CORINTO, THE NICARAGUAN PORT RECENTLY OCCUPIED BY THE BRITISH.

Tying to Bone.

An extraordinary malady which puzzles the physicians has prostrated a citizen of Philadelphia. The "Press" of that city says that the man has been discharged as incurable from three hospitals and now lies awaiting death. His disease is pronounced by the doctors to be "Rheumatoid Arthritis," but is commonly called ossification. It dates from one hot July day several years ago when the man went to Atlantic City for a day's holiday. He spent the afternoon in dancing and when extremely hot went into the water to get cool. He caught a severe cold, but was not alarmed until he found his limbs becoming stiff and unnaturally hard. In spite of hospital treatment, and the care of doctors who became interested in the case, the disease has increased until now his head and shoulders are the only parts of his body he can move. His limbs are contorted and insensible, and he lies motionless day and night, wearily anticipating the death which must soon end his misery. It is a most pitiable condition to retain consciousness while the greater part of the body is dead. A still more terrible condition is that far more common one in which the physical and mental natures are alive and alert, while the soul is dead.

Dead while she liveth. (1. Timothy 5: 6.)

An Unexpected Inheritance.

An announcement in the Brooklyn, N.Y., papers reads almost like romance. It states that a wealthy farmer at Holdbrook, L. I., who died a few weeks ago, has left the whole of his property to a poor tailor at Patchogue. Last year, the tailor witnessed a runaway accident. Some man was thrown out of a wagon, and was lying unconscious in the road at Patchogue. The tailor joined the crowd around the prostrate man, and as no one seemed disposed to do anything for him, the tailor had him carried to his home and cared for him until he recovered. The tailor thought lightly of his service, but the injured man was very grateful. He said he was a farmer and should bring some farm produce as a present to the man who had been kind to him. Since that time the farmer's wagon has stopped every week at the tailor's door on the way to market, and has left some small delicacy for him. The farmer, too, paid him an occasional visit, and the two became warm friends. The tailor was shocked early last month at receiving a notice of his friend's death. He was still more surprised when he was notified that the farmer had made him his heir and that he was the owner of a farm supposed to be worth many thousands of dollars. The people who were in the crowd that day of the accident doubtless thought regretfully, when they heard of the tailor's good fortune, that it might have been theirs if they had been kind to the injured man. But their regret is small compared with that which will be felt at the last day when Christ gives an eternal inheritance to those who in life succored the poor and afflicted in his name.

Then shall the King say . . . Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you, etc. (Matt. 25: 34-40.)

Rescued in Mid-Ocean.

The Hamburg steamer "Albano," which arrived at New York last week, brought to this port the crew of the Norwegian bark, "Marie," who had been rescued in mid-ocean. The "Marie" took on cargo at Liverpool, and started on the voyage across the Atlantic on April 13. Progress was slow, owing to head winds. On April 22 it was discovered that the ship was leaking badly. The carpenter did his best to stop the leak, and the crew worked at the pumps. In spite of their efforts, however, the water gained on them, and after two days' unceasing labor, they gave up in despair. The forward part of the ship sank until the bulwarks were below the water. The crew went to the poop and there waited, watching eagerly for some passing steamer to rescue them. During the night the lights of a steamer were seen, and rockets were sent up from the water-logged bark to attract her attention, but she held on her course. On the following morning another steamer was sighted, but she, too, passed on, in spite of the signals of distress. Again night fell, and the crew shivering with cold and hunger, watched for help. They had a tar-barrel which they set on fire when the lights of a steamer appeared. She passed so close to the bark that the men could distinguish the colors on her funnels, but she, too, went on and left them to their fate. The crew began to despair after so many disappointments, but the next morning help came. The "Albano" bore down upon them and took them all on board. It is extraordinary that they were not rescued earlier. Probably their signals were not seen by the other steamers that passed. It would be uncharitable to conclude that the sailors saw men perishing and made no attempt to rescue them. Such inhumanity would be very shocking, and is very uncommon, though it is not at all uncommon to see Christians indifferent to the peril of people around them who are in danger of perishing eternally.

I looked on my right hand . . . . and beheld, but there was no man that would know me . . . no man cared for my soul. (Ps. 142: 4).

A CHURCH AT CORINTO.

Married by Proxy.

A remarkable wedding was solemnized at the church of St. Francis de Sales, Brooklyn, N. Y., on April 24. The bride was of Spanish descent, though born in this country. She had been engaged for some time to a Spanish gentleman who had formerly been a neighbor of her family. Some months ago he accepted an appointment as manager of a factory at Tampa, Fla. He went to his new duties, expecting to return in a few weeks and be married. The date for the wedding was fixed, but the young man found that it would be impossible to leave his business even for a day without losing his situation. He begged that the wedding might take place in his absence, and the bride's family finally consented. A power-of-attorney was duly prepared, authorizing his brother to represent him at the ceremony and make the necessary pledges on his behalf. This was signed and sworn before a notary, and forwarded to the bridegroom's brother in Brooklyn. The ceremony was performed, and the same evening the bride sailed for Florida to join her husband. It is stated that the peculiar ceremony is perfectly legal and binding. The bride showed that she considered it so by setting out promptly to join her husband. Had she remained in her old home and made no change in her life, the bridegroom would have been justified in thinking that she did not attach much importance to the ceremony. Yet we often see persons who take upon them the name of Christ, and who are received by solemn ceremonies into his church in his name, who remain in the world, and do not go to him for the blessings he can impart.

Christ loved the church . . that he might sanctify and cleanse it. (Eph. 5: 25, 26.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Certain Editorial Changes and Improvements are now in contemplation by the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and before making them, we would like to ascertain the views of our friends on the following questions, and we invite all who are interested to answer on postal cards as soon as convenient: 1. Which of the various Departments that usually appear in the paper: The Sermons, the Editorial page, the Serial Story, the Home Circle, the Sunday School Lesson, THE MAIL-BAG, The Bible and Newspaper, or the Church Societies' page—do you turn to and read first, and which do you find most interesting? 2. Do the members of your own family give preference to the same Departments, or to some other, and if so, which Department? Address all postals on the subject to Editorial Department, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

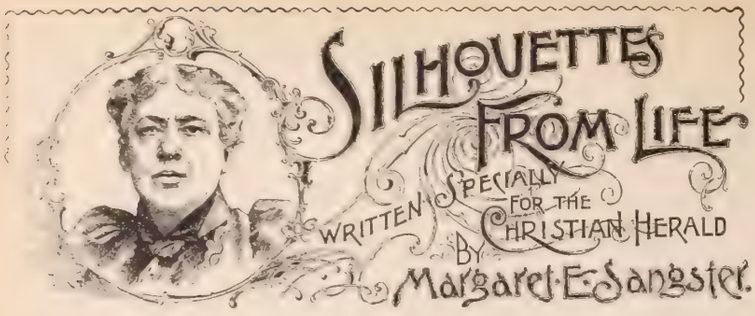
"Le Signal," the only French Protestant daily journal, has now attained a year of existence, and is steadily gaining support among the French Protestant population.

The American Sunday School Union Celebrated its seventy-first anniversary on May 12 in Brooklyn, N. Y. The services were held in the Flatbush Reformed Church. Besides Dr. J. M. Crowell and other officers of the Union, Morris K. Jessup, Esq., Dr. Rhoades, Dr. Welles and other speakers of various denominations delivered addresses.

Evangelistic Sevices are Being Help through this month in the Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn: Outdoor Services of Song and Testi are held every evening in front of the Church, followed at eight o'clock by an indoor service. Mr. F. H. Jacobs, of Chicago, has charge of the music, and Miss Bessie B. Tyson, of Washington, conducts the children's services.

The American Female Guardian Society celebrated its sixty-first anniversary on Wednesday, May 8. The Society's building, 29 East Twenty-ninth St., New York, was the scene of rejoicing all day and the friends and patrons received a cordial welcome from the managers. Miss Grace H. Dodge and other well-known philanthropists took part in the exercises. During the past year 376 children have been sheltered in the institution.

Pastors are reminded that on June 2, which is Whitsunday, the Subject of Christian Unity will be discussed in many pulpits here and in England. On February 11th, at a meeting in Chicago of four hundred ministers of various denominations, a resolution was passed, unanimously recommending the suggestion to all ministers to devote Whitsunday of every year to the promotion of unity among Christians of the evangelical denominations.



The Lord Will Provide.

THERE was nothing in the house but bread and molasses. Mother set it on the table, and made a cup of tea for Ben before he went to the office. Ben's luncheon was nothing but dry bread. It had taken the last cent mother and son could scrape together to pay the rent, for rent must be paid, even if you go without fire, clothes and food.

All mother's things that she cared for, the little carved clock with the cuckoo, her pretty white shawl with the gray embroidered border, her silver spoons, the portrait of her father the Colonel, in his uniform with the red sash and the sword, had gone to the pawnbroker's long ago. There were four children besides Ben, and father was dead. Mother had been very happy and comfortable when father was alive. Ben was big enough to remember it, but father was dead now, and mother took in shirts to make, and nobody could help her except Ben.

Little Ben, with his pale thin face and great sorrowful eyes, his legs too long for trousers and sleeves too short for his arms, had at last gotten a situation in an office. He had to work hard, and run all day, but he didn't care so long as he could help mother. He had two dollars a week, and he expected to have his wages raised in six months. Then he would bring home three dollars every Saturday night, please God.

It came quite natural to Ben to say "please God," for mother said it often. This morning when her little lad stepped out into the cold, with no overcoat, and only bread and molasses for his breakfast, she said cheerily,

"Don't fret, my boy. The Lord will provide!"

That day it happened that the head of the firm wanted a message taken, in a great hurry, just at noon, and strangely enough, there was not a boy about but Ben. Mr. J—— sent Ben, was pleased with his prompt, business-like manner, and his respectful obedience, and then noticed how wretchedly the little fellow was dressed. He sent for the head of the department.

"That boy, Benny, what do you know of him?"

"Nice little chap," said the man addressed. "Son of a lawyer, who died several years ago; good man, but had no knack of getting on. The mother has had a hard time. But she's good, a lady. The boy is well brought up."

"He's about the size of my Willie," said the merchant, musingly.

That afternoon the merchant's wife received a telegram from her husband. "Send at once a whole warm suit of Will's clothes, everything except overcoat and shoes. I want them here by five o'clock."

A clothier that afternoon received an order for a thick, well-made top-coat to fit a boy of thirteen, and the packages arriving at the store, were given to the merchant, who gleefully placed them in his private office.

At half-past five, Benny was called for. "Mr. J—— wishes to see you at once," was the order. Ben went to the door of the sanctum ready for errand or service, and was greeted by his employer thus:

"Benjamin, I am going to leave you here, and you are to stay till the other boys have gone home. In the meantime, here are a suit of clothes and an overcoat. They do not fit me, but I fancy they are about your size, and you must try them on."

It was a very proud and light-hearted boy who rushed home that evening, all clad from top to toe, in warm, serviceable things, with a splendid, thick overcoat, and three crisp one-dollar bills in the pocket, for "shoes" the good Mr. J—— had said.

But when he reached the home in the fourth floor back, he hardly knew it. Supper was on the table; a steak! and baked potatoes! and coffee! His mother was moving briskly about. The children were playing beside a bright fire, which crackled merrily in the stove.

The picture of his grandfather, the Colonel, was hanging in its old place over the mantel, and the cuckoo clock was just below it.

"Mother! Mother! Mother!" shouted Ben. "See my new suit! But what has happened here?"

"The Lord has provided, my son," said his mother.

Then came her explanation:

An artist, looking for a second-hand sword as a property to adorn his studio, had visited that day the pawnbroker's shop on Ben's corner.

The first thing his eyes espied was the Colonel's picture. In great surprise he demanded where it had come from.

"Great Scott! —my old Colonel! God bless him! Why, I went through the Wilderness with that brave fellow, and I loved him like a father! How came his portrait here?"

The story was soon told, and the artist, learning that his old Colonel's daughter lived near by, and was in deep poverty, went to see her and introduced himself as one of her father's old soldiers. In an hour, the pawn-shop had rendered up its booty to the last article, groceries had come and coal, and the tables had turned for that family.

The relief of the moment was succeeded by substantial benefits. Ben was promoted step by step. Ben's mother gave up her shirt-making, and was employed at living wages to sew for several well-to-do families. "Please God," she said to Ben, "we will never distrust him. He is bound to take care of his children, even if he has to work miracles to do it." And her clear voice rose tunefully in the hymn she had always loved:

THE FINAL WORDS.

In preaching the funeral sermon of Dr. R. W. Dale, whose portrait was published in this journal on March 27, Dr. Fairbairn mentioned a significant fact. He said that the lamented preacher, whose life was one of singular purity and lofty principle, was preparing a sermon when he was seized with his last illness. He was interrupted in writing it, and laid down his pen with little thought that he would never take it in his hand again. The sheet of paper was found on his desk after his death. It contained these words:

"Unworldliness does not consist in the most rigid and conscientious observance of any external rules of conduct; but in the spirit and temper and in the habit of living created by the vision of God, by constant fellowship with him, by a personal and vivid experience of the greatness of the Christian Redemption, and the settled purpose to do and to will all that God wills, always, in all things, and at all costs, and by the power of a great hope, the full assurance that, after our mortal years are spent, there is a larger, fuller, richer loftier life in——"

The sentence was unfinished. In telling his congregation what were the last words their pastor wrote, Dr. Fairbairn said: "There it ends—'in'—the ineffable, the unspeakable. Shall we say—'in the bosom of God' where now he dwells?"

LOWLY SERVICE.

O MASTER, let me walk with thee
In lowly paths of service free;
Tell me thy secret; help me bear
The strain of toil, the fret of care.

Help me the slow of heart to move
By some clear, winning word of love;
Teach me the wayward feet to stay,
And guide them in the homeward way.

Teach me thy patience! still with thee
In closer, dearer company,
In work that keeps faith sweet and strong,
In trust that triumphs over wrong.

A Converted Giantess.

Our Sunday School Missionary Wri of his Meeting with Miss Ella Ewi over Eight Feet Tall.

OONE CO., M April 29. T divers opp tunities spreading t Gospel in n sionary wo will appear, part, in the lowing na tive of rec Sunday Sc and missionary work: Having occasio visit the city of Columbia, Mo., for a days, I taught a Sunday School clas young ladies, most of whom were stude in the Baptist Female College, after wh I addressed the Baptist Sunday Sch From the Baptist Church I went to Presbyterian, where I made a brief addr on this missionary work. About 3 P. I attended a mission service a short tance in the country, where Rev. T. Sharp, my cousin by blood, and my so the Gospel, preached, and I distribu tracts and conversed with a number of sons in reference to their spiritual welf At night I preached in the city at the M Church, South. On Monday night, at Baptist Church, I addressed the Yo People's Meeting on the preservation, p ty, and historic transmission of the Testament.

A few nights later, I gave a Bi reading at the M. E. Church, South. "The Evidences of Conversion." Fr Columbia I went to Centralia, wher preached on Friday night in the Chris Church, on "The Evidences of Christ ity," which I deem very important, on count of the spread of infidelity. Next d I went to the neighborhood of a cour church in Audrain county, where I pre ed on Sunday. I arrived at home on M day evening, and went on Wednesday Gorin, Scotland county, where the Ki ville Presbytery of the Cumberland P byterian Church was in session, and night preached on the topic, "Experime Religion." On Friday afternoon I dressed the Young People's Society Christian Endeavor. That night hav listened to an able discourse, I follo with a few words of exhortation. F persons rose for prayer and instruction.

After I had preached the next nigh went into the country a few miles to b an appointment to organize a Sun School, at a school house on Sunday m ing. The attendance was good at the t appointed, and I organized Cedar Gr Sunday School, and in answer to the q tion, "How many would promise to r me in heaven?" most of them raised t hands.

I had an appointment in the afterno about six miles distant, to re-organiz Price school house. The rain ceased time for a fair attendance of parents children at the school house. Some c in after I had begun my address, am them a young lady who had to stoop siderably to enter through the door. I knew she must be the famous giant Miss Ella Ewing. She was raised in district. I had heard much of her g height from friends, but was not prep to see such a wonderful person. She passed my expectations. She entered he ily into the Sunday School organizat At the close of the services I obtained interview with her. She is intelligent, refined manners, and best of all, she Christian, having been converted al four years ago. She told me, in answe my question that her height is eight and two inches, and I think no one st ing in her presence could doubt it. weight is said to be about 287 pounds; her shoe, I am told, is near seventeen i es long, her hands correspond with general appearance, and she is fairly proportioned, neither slender nor excess ly corpulent. She is very much estee in her community, and stands well in estimation of all who see her. Wit doubt, that Sunday School has the ta scholar in the United States. The he of her father, I judge to be about six and her mother's height very little ab the average.

I am now on an extended tour in the portion of Boone county.

THE NATIONAL COINAGE.*

COINAGE is the exercise of one of the highest functions of a sovereign power. It cannot be exercised by any one of the States, nor by any private individual or corporation; and any semblance of imitating the coinage of precious metals used for money, or printed notes or bonds of the United States, is strictly prohibited under the most severe penalties. At all mints of the United States, the precious metals used as a circulating medium are coined into money, stamped with the devices and insignia of the Nation's sovereignty, as the Secretary of the Treasury, under the authority of Congress, may direct. At the mints are established assay offices, in with the true value and fineness of metals used for coinage are determined. Any person may bring to the mints any quantity of gold or silver, and upon the payment of a small sum for the expense of coinage, receive it back in the form of coin ready for circulation.

When the assayer of a mint has determined the true value of the precious metals so deposited, he issues to the depositor a certificate of the value of the deposit, and on that certificate the chief officer of the mint will pay to the holder thereof the sum of money for which it calls. These certificates may be used in the transaction of commercial business, and they answer the purpose of checks, notes, or treasury warrants.

Another function of the mints and assay offices is to melt gold and silver and run the metal into bars or ingots, and to stamp on each bar or ingot the true value thereof, according to the United States standard.

For the convenience of the people, assay offices are established in several cities where there are no mints. At these offices, gold and silver bullion and foreign coins are received, melted, refined, and cast into bars or ingots, and the true value thereof is stamped thereon, the depositor paying a fee for the work so done.

Or, the depositor may have foreign coins, or gold and silver bullion, cast into coins of the United States, as before provided, after the assay office has ascertained the true value thereof.

Seigniorage is a percentage upon bullion brought to the mint to be coined or to be exchanged for coin. It is the amount claimed by the Government for the exercise of its exclusive right to coin the metal, and it represents the difference between the intrinsic value of a mass of gold or silver bullion and the face value of the coins that the Government may make from the mass.

AT MY CALL.*

ERE I lay me down the burden
That my soul on earth hath worn.
Let me feel before departing,
That my tree of life hath borne
Fruitage that shall ever onward
Move mankind along the road.
Toward the haven of the blessed.
Toward the City of my God.

Let some word that I have spoken
Or some act performed by me,
Sound aloud thro' coming ages
Making captive souls more free;
Not to bring me earthly glory
Nor to bring me empty fame.
But to prove the mighty power
In a risen Saviour's name.

Let my work be all completed
When the summons comes to go:
Let there be no cause for weeping.
Let there be no sound of woe.
When the spirit from my Father
Beckons me from duty done,
To appear at his tribunal.
And receive the crown that's won.

THE LATTER DAYS.

Reasons for Believing that Unfulfilled Prophecies are Becoming Exhausted.

BY REV. TALBOT GREAVES.

ONE great difficulty meets us on the threshold of this most interesting subject—the actual period of time intended by the terms, "the last days," "the latter day," "the end of days," or the more simple and solemn "the end." The Scriptures abound in predictions of the signs of this period, and it is only by a careful examination of the context that we can fix the exact period intended. We are prepared to expect that the predictions should be more or less descriptive of the whole period, so that there has never been a century since Christ came when students of prophecy have not seen the predicted signs of the close of the dispensation gathering round. For centuries there have been early developments of most of those features which we now regard as signs of the approaching end of the age, such as Romanism, Infidelity and Lawlessness. But the number of predictions unfulfilled is becoming very small indeed, this seeming exhaustion alike of prophecy and the resources of the future, proclaims most conclusively the nearness of the end. The world of science seems almost to have reached its limit of discovery. How much further can it penetrate beyond electricity, beyond magnetism, and beyond chemical affinity, the telephone, the telegraph, photography, and the wonders of light? Does it not seem that the human mind must soon reach its boundary line, "and then shall the end come."

There are predictions which are now being fulfilled for the first time: such for instance as those which foretell the decay of the temporal power of the Papacy and of Mohammedanism, the rapid diffusion of knowledge, the very methods of which seem given in Daniel 12: 4; the extension of missions, the startling vividness with which Peter's prophecy classifies the peculiar features of modern scepticism, giving as its very argument the words "Where is the sign?" drawn from the stability of nature, the wide-spread defection from the truth among religious professors, and teaching so subtle that the Lord declares that if it were possible it should deceive the very elect. Such teaching is going on all around us, not in this communion and in that, but in every section of the visible Church. While there is much ground for congratulation in the character of the times in which we live, with many changes which are for the better and not for the worse, while there is an unwise propensity to magnify the evils of the present and the benefits of the past, a deeper insight beneath the gilded surface discloses elements of action and mischief which may well create very grave misgivings.

The shadows of coming peril are portentous and imminent. Eighteen centuries have passed since, looking forward from his days to the last days of the Church, Paul gave the expressive warning that the time through which they had to pass would be stormy and full of danger to their faith, stability, and comfort. "Know this," said the Apostle, and we must know. It is not enough to be assured of safety in Christ. We must know our position, duty, difficulties, and prospects as to the Church and the World, the dangers against which we are called to watch, the conflicts which lie before us, and like the tribe of Issachar we must understand the times and know what Israel ought to do. In conclusion let us look to Christ's coming as the hope of the Church the purity and stability of which are threatened by the progress of infidelity, Romanism, and the vice, corruption, and lawlessness of the age. We wait for him as our deliverer from all evil.

CHRIST'S CROSS, MY CROSS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing May 25. Mark 8: 34-38.

NO attempt was ever made by Christ to conceal or minimize the difficulties of the Christian life. The idea of cross-bearing he presented again and again under different figures. He seldom descended to details, but occupied himself with broad principles of general application. That is why the teaching of One who lived in an Oriental land eighteen centuries ago, is the guide of our lives in a land and a time and in social conditions so strongly contrasted with those with which he was familiar. He knew men, understood them by divine intuition, and spoke the truths which every man, whatever his race or station, could take into his own life and use for his own development. Once, indeed, he did give practical application of his teaching, instead of leaving the inquirer to apply it for himself. A man who was not far from the kingdom of God, yet did not know how to get into it, came to him with his questions. Jesus let him state his position and describe what he had already accomplished, and then, seeing that he needed definite guidance, told him that the next step in his case was to give up all he possessed. That was the cross in his case. If every man went to Jesus on the same errand, the answer might and probably would be different in almost every case. There are some wealthy men who would not be required to get rid of their wealth. They do not hold it very dear, and would be quite willing to be poor. They would be required to give up something that is more precious to them than riches. "Let him deny himself and take up his cross," is the order of development. Whatever hinders the spirit in rising, whatever the nature of the chain that holds it down to the worldly and physical life, is to be cast off. In the nature of things, doing so must entail suffering. The thing that binds the spirit down must be very strong, must be woven of the very fibres of our being, otherwise it could not hold the spirit captive. And thus it is like cutting to the very heart to give it up. "This thing is not wrong, and I am very fond of it, why should I give it up?" the aspirant may ask. The reply must be, "No, it is not wrong, and you may keep it without sin, but if you want to be a man, to be Christ-like, to rise to the full possibility of your being, you can do so only by giving it up." The rising out of the human into the divine, which is the supreme privilege offered to the sons of men, is to be attained only by severing the bonds that hold us to the human. Jesus showed the way by dying on the cross. "I lay down my life, no man taketh it from me," he said proudly in view of that sublime act. By his death he served the race to the end of time. In ever-increasing numbers in every generation his death is drawing men upward. The individual, whether he be moral or vicious, educated or ignorant, rich or poor, if the spiritual be not dead in him, cannot come near Calvary [illegible] The filth and the slime and the sensualism and selfishness of our lives slough off in the presence of the Cross, and we rise to a higher level. Some, indeed, fall back, but there are others who struggle on upward, inspired, nerved, and strengthened by the wondrous spectacle. They are the men who are being changed into his image, and will one day be like him, seeing him as he is.

INDIAN DAUGHTERS OF THE KING.

Every one has heard of the good work that is being done for the Indians in the great school at Carlisle, Pa., but probably few know how much the Order of King's Daughters is doing quietly and unostentatiously among the Indian girls in the school. We are indebted to "The Silver Cross" for a photograph of one Circle in the school and for the portrait of a Sioux girl who is President of another Circle, both of which are reproduced on this page. It appears that about three-fourths of the girls now in the Carlisle school are organized for active work into Circles of King's Daughters. The work of the Order has a peculiar charm for them. The simplicity of its obligations, the modesty of its purpose, its creed, that it is better to be than to do, all find a ready response in the timid but honest nature of our Indian sister. Thus many are won for the Master's cause who would hesitate to make a public profession of a more formal nature. A case in point was reported a few months ago. A Chippewa girl who knew but little English, applied for membership in one of the Circles. She was known to be a thoroughly good girl, and had been asked only a little while before if she did not feel the time had come for her to connect with some church; but after attending a series of preparatory meetings she decided that she would defer the matter still a little longer. When asked, "Why do you desire to be known as The King's Daughter?" she replied, "Oh, I can know what you talk about like Jesus, just one kind father or brother, but that man preach, I don't understand." The girl knew what it meant to love and trust Christ, but she failed to catch all that was implied in the theological system taught from the pulpit. After all, the Order is doing the better work if it is leading the Indian girls to strive to be like Jesus. It is more important that they should follow him in their hearts and lives than that they should become profound theologians.

Indian Mothers.

Their Love of Home and Children — Sioux Life on the Western Prairies.

CLOSER contact with our Indian brothers and sisters, and more especially in the line of missionary and educational work, has disclosed many good qualities which they were not heretofore believed to possess. As a race. Indians are taciturn and undemonstrative, and this equally in the case of both the male and the female warlike traits. Yet, although is very far from being unknown among them, even among the Sioux, whose antagonism to the whites has been more persistent than that of many other tribes, the domestic tie is strong and mothers are loving and indulgent toward offspring, and quite as careful of them in their own rude and semi-barbarous way as their white sisters could possibly be. Should a member of a lodge become sick and the tribal doctor treat him without result, some one of the household will silently wrap his blanket around him and, realizing that earthly aid is unavailing, will steal away to some lonely mountain side and there with fasting and imploration call upon the Great Spirit, who is the mysterious unknown God of the red man, to restore the sick one to health.

When death visits a lodge, the sorrow of the Indian father and mother is as keen as human lips can express and human heart can feel. The wailing of a mother over her dead is described by Mrs. Frances Chamberlain Holley, who lived for several years among the Dakota Sioux, as "sounds once heard, never to be forgotten;" and as recalling the Scriptural picture of Rachel weeping for her children. "Me choonkshee! Me choonkshee! (My daughter, my daughter!" she mourns, "alas, alas, my comfort has departed, my heart is very sad. My joys is turned to sorrow, and my song is weeping. Shall I never behold thy sunny face? Shall I never hear the music of thy voice? The Great Spirit has entered my lodge in anger, and taken thee from me, my child. I am comfortless and must wail out my grief. Me choonkshee! me choonkshee! The light of my eyes is extinguished, all is dark. I have cast from me all comfortable clothing, and robed myself in rags, for no clothing, no fire can warm thee, my daughter. Unwashed and uncombed I will mourn for thee whose long locks I can never more braid: whose cheeks I can never again tinge with vermilion. I will cast off my tangled hair, for my grief is great, Me choonkshee! me choonkshee!"

The Dakotas have a beautiful saying that a mother is "with her children whenever they think of her," and that whenever anything of importance happens to the child, the mother feels it simultaneously in her own breast.

On the father's side, all his brothers are called "fathers" to his children, and his brothers' children he calls his children in turn. Similarly, the mother's sisters are all "mothers" to her little brood. In this kindly sort of relationship the various families that constitute a lodge (or group of tepees like those shown in the illustration), live together in bonds of closest friendship and mutual dependence. A half-dozen portable tents, with the most primitive outfit of domestic utensils, a sufficiency of blankets, perhaps a dozen or more hardy ponies, and the weapons of the chase, constitute the total wealth of the lodge. The "Medicine Man," or native doctor, is also chief adviser, priest and wizard combined; yet, apart from the gross charlatanism of their pretensions, these men very often possess real skill in the application of herbs and simples in cases of sickness.

One of the most remarkable of the multitude of legends preserved among the Dakota Sioux would seem to point to the knowledge of a Saviour long before the story of the Cross is usually supposed to have been brought across the Atlantic to the Western World by the white men. According to this legend, a man came from God among their people nine hundred years ago. He wore a "scalp-coat" of deer skin. After his arrival, he told the people that the Son of God had died upon a cross, that his blood had been shed, and that if they desired to live forever, they must also submit to blood-shedding in their own persons. He constructed a wooden cross, and in obedience to his instructions, they gathered around it every year to worship by song and prayer and dancing. And thus it may be that, in the passage of the generations, the glimpse of the divine truth which they originally obtained from some devout trader or teacher, has gradually become perverted until the modern Indian "sun-dance," with its excitements, its torturings, and flesh-cuttings and blood-letting, and other barbarous accompaniments is the result. What was, at some remote period, a purely religious act, has become a meaningless heathen rite

There are no brighter pupils at the Hampton Training Institute than the youths of the Sioux nation. Some have already been educated, and have returned to their own race to teach the Gospel and the arts of civilization to their brothers and sisters.

Woman's Sympathy.

"A woman's whole life is a history of the affections," wrote Washington Irving. "The heart is her world; it is there her ambition strives for empire: it is there her ambition seeks for hidden treasures. She sends forth her sympathies on adventure: she embarks her whole soul in the traffic of affection; and if shipwrecked, her case is hopeless, for it is bankruptcy of the heart."

Spare the Birds.

A CHRISTIAN HERALD reader, in Lafayette, Ind., writes: "I thank you for the noble stand you have taken in defense of bird-life, or against the slaughter of the innocents. The horticulturist of to-day finds it exceedingly difficult to raise plums or smooth apples and pears for the want of restraint by parents to spare the life of the insect-eating birds, killed wantonly by thoughtless boys to indulge a wicked inclination. I am devoting a considerable part of my life to raising small and large fruit, and find it necessary to study daily, and sometimes far into the night, what poisonous mixtures to prepare for spraying purposes to save plums, pears, and apples, from the ravages of insects, formerly kept in check by insect-eating birds.

"There is another side to this wanton killing of birds. Living in the suburbs of Lafayette, I miss the glad songs and warbling of the feathered tribe; the song of the robin, which some good poet has so feelingly described:

A song of happy praise,
To usher in the morning,
A voice of life to raise
Joy to the sleeping,
Though shadows fall upon our road
While [illegible] sings
And disappointment lays its heavy load,
The robin sings.
[illegible]
The [illegible] willings its homeward flight,
Mountains [illegible] darkness [illegible]
The robin sings.

EXERCISES FOR CHILDREN.

"SOUND mind in sound body" is a saying which every mother ought to bear in mind, and she should strive to accustom her little folks to such simple physical exercises as are calculated to aid development and secure health and gracefulness. Emile Heyne, in "Home and Country," gives some very simple and agreeable suggestions for juvenile exercises, of which these are the most practical:

First, stand erect; raise the extended arms straight out from the sides until they are on a level with the shoulders, then lower them again. But do not swing the arms up, or drop them, but make the motion one of distinct raising and lowering.

Second, when the arms are extended from the sides on a level with the shoulders, bring them — still extended — in front of you until the hands touch. Both of these exercises should be continued until the muscles feel tired. Keep count, and you will note how you can increase them from day to day without any increase of weariness. The two exercises mentioned strengthen the muscles of the shoulders and back.

Third, stand erect and rigid, about two feet from the wall; place hands against the wall, on a level with the shoulders. Then, without changing the position of your feet or relaxing the rigidity of your body, incline your body towards the wall by flexing the arms, until your forehead touches; push yourself back to the first position. This is a good developer of the triceps, pectoral and chest muscles generally. After the pupil is strong enough, let him lie flat on the floor, and raise and lower his body by means of his arms, placed on a level with the shoulders.

The muscles of the thigh should be developed by raising the extended legs either in front of you, or to the side, according to the set of muscles to be developed. The calf-muscles are best trained by raising on tiptoe and slowly sinking to the heel again. The muscles of the forearm are greatly increased by simply opening and closing the hands, with arms extended. Slow stooping and straightening up again exercises, strengthen the back.

These are the principal exercises, which —among others equally as simple—should be practised daily from childhood. The results, when coupled with fresh air, healthful diet and healthy surroundings, will be a strong body, a clear brain, and a happy disposition.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER XIX.

The Trial.

THE police court was crowded. Several private carriages had stopped at its door, a very unusual thing. Mr. Jackson, when he entered with his brother, the lawyer, was greatly surprised at the size and respectability of the crowd.

"There must be some important case on this morning," said Mr. Jackson. "I am sorry that I let this thing go so far, but somehow I've been muddled in my calculations; they have rushed the thing faster and farther than I intended, and I have had no chance to come to the rescue, as I had laid out to do do."

"It is much better as it is," said the brother. "Nothing but a heroic dose would bring her to her senses. We have such a strong case that we can convict in a few minutes. We can secure a pardon afterward. She will agree to anything rather than go to prison. You will have to marry her. We shall not be safe until she is your wife."

"What in thunder have they brought Louie and Nettie here for?" said Mr. Jackson, as he caught sight of them with the Wilson party on the other side of the room. "I told Mrs. Wilson that she only would be wanted. And look at that white-headed old fellow; he is Mapleton's old lawyer. What the mischief is he here for?"

"Nothing to do with our case, you may make your mind easy on that; but I hope the old fool may not recognize the name, and go poking his nose into the case."

Mr. Graham stood near the door of the room from which the prisoners were brought, and when the policeman entered with Alice, he whispered:

"Keep up your courage, Miss."

Alice nodded, and even gave him a smile. She walked with a proud step. Alice kept her eyes on the floor; she had not the courage to look around. Poor Louie arose when Alice entered, and was about to rush over and greet her, when her mother pulled her back, and said in a severe voice, "Please show a little dignity and common sense," and Louie buried her face in her handkerchief and cried."

Mr. Jackson had taken a position where he could see Alice and not be seen by her. He was pale and very nervous; he would look at his watch, take a quick and stealthy glance around the room, and then look again at his watch.

"Alice Mapleton, stand up."

Alice slowly arose to her feet.

"What name did he say, mamma?" asked Louie, as she caught her mother's arm with a quick and nervous grasp. There was a surprised, almost frightened, look on her face.

"Oh, only one of her many names; not her real one, you may be sure," said Mrs. Wilson.

The magistrate continued, "I find you charged with stealing a diamond bracelet; do you plead guilty or not guilty?"

"Not guilty," said Alice in a low, distinct voice.

"Have you counsel?" asked the Judge.

"I am here to look after the young lady's interests," said the old lawyer.

Jackson turned a shade paler, and looked at his watch oftener than before.

"This begins to look serious," said his brother. "The Judge is acting like an old fool, and speaks to the girl as if he were in a drawing-room instead of a police court, and as if she were a lady instead of a thief; somebody must have engaged old Brougham to defend her."

Mrs. Wilson was the first witness called. We will simply give a synopsis of the evidence given, leaving out the technical court forms and language.

"Yes, she knew the prisoner at the bar; she engaged her to give dancing lessons to her (Mrs. Wilson's) daughters. She had no references, and she did an unusual thing by engaging her, because her sketches showed talent; she thought she was helping a deserving person, but found that she was mistaken, as she soon saw by her deportment and conversation that she was not a proper person to associate with her daughters, even as a teacher, then—"

"Please come to the point," said the magistrate. "The bracelet is all we want to hear about."

"My daughter had it on her arm when she went into the room to take her lesson; she removed it and laid it on the mantelpiece. After the lesson the bracelet was missed, before the teacher had been gone an hour. No other person was in the room. Of course I at once suspected the prisoner, the more so as I had heard stories derogatory to her character from other places where she had been engaged, so I charged her with the theft, and instead of asking mercy, or even confessing her baseness, she flew into a passion and grossly insulted me in my own house, although we had found the pawn-ticket in her own sketch-book, so I felt that, however painful it might be to me personally, it was a duty I owed society to have her arrested."

"One question before you leave the stand," said Mr. Brougham. "Who gave you the information as to her former character that you speak of?"

"I object," said Mr. Jackson's brother. "I am watching the case for Mrs. Wilson, and she is not compelled to answer such a question."

"Well, we will not press it now; that will do, Mrs. Wilson."

Jackson took a long breath, and Mrs. Wilson appeared glad to get back to her seat.

Mr. Briggs was the next witness.

"He was a detective, had been sent for by Mrs. Wilson, and the case put into his hands. He shadowed the prisoner at the Bar, saw her go into Mr. Jacobs' pawn shop, watched her through the window, saw her get the bracelet and leave. Should have arrested her then, but Mrs. Wilson had told him not to arrest until she ordered him. Found the ticket in her sketch-book, and called with it for the bracelet and was told that it was gone. Called again and found that it had been brought back, and he received it and was ordered to arrest, as the case was clear—"

At this point Mrs. Mapleton and Mrs. Callaghan entered.

Alice, when she saw her mother, sprang to her feet, took one step toward her, then stopped and looked as if she was going to faint; but she recovered in a moment and smiled when she saw that her mother walked with a light step and the dignified look and demeanor of old times, and if she had not the smile on her face suggested by Mrs. Callaghan, that good woman wore one on her good-natured face large enough for both.

Mrs. Mapleton went straight to Alice, and Mr. Brougham sprang forward with a chair, which he placed near Alice, for her mother. The meeting between the old lawyer and the lady was a cordial one, and after shaking hands he whispered:

"Do not be at all alarmed, madame, your daughter is perfectly safe, not a taint of disgrace will attach to her when she leaves this room."

Mrs. Mapleton thanked Mr. Brougham, and taking Alice's hand in hers, seated herself quietly.

Mrs. Wilson turned very pale when she recognized Mrs. Mapleton.

"Have you any defence, Mr. Brougham?" asked the Magistrate.

"We shall not detain the court many minutes with our defence," said Mr. Brougham. "It may not be known to your Honor that this young lady who now stands charged with theft is a member of one of the first families of our city and, until a year or two ago, one of the most wealthy. How her honored father lost his wealth has nothing to do with this case. But as he and his lady (now a widow) have honored me by their friendship for many years, you will not think it strange that I take a deep interest in the young lady's welfare. She is fatherless, and has been using her talents with great industry and independence to support her mother and self, although if she had her rights, she would be a wealthy girl. But that has nothing to do with this case."

A cloud passed over Jackson's face, as the brothers exchanged quick glances in which there was surprise, if not fear.

"Do let us go home," Alfreda whispered to her mother. "You have got us into a pretty mess by your duty to society."

Mrs. Wilson (after recovering from the shock caused by the appearance of Mrs. Mapleton and her recognition) had sat bolt upright in her chair, with a firm determined look in her face, a look that said, "I am doing my duty and am a martyr to the well being of society." She now turned to Alfreda, "I would thank you, Alfreda, to hold your tongue; if you are afraid to do your duty, I am not. I am sorry that the girl is connected with my old friend, Mrs. Mapleton, but as their own lawyer says, they have lost everything, and the girl is working for a living, they are nobodies."

Mr. Graham, when he saw Mrs. Mapleton enter the court, had (after whispering a few words to a policeman) left the room.

The old lawyer went on: "We are not here to ask for sympathy or mercy, for we need in this case neither the one nor the other. All we ask is simply justice, and, to this end, I shall call one or two witness:—

"Miss Louie Wilson will please take the stand!"

Poor Louie; her eyes were red with weeping. She looked first at Alice, and when their eyes met, the look seemed to give her courage, for instead of a frown, Alice gave her a smile of encouragement.

"Is this your bracelet?" the lawyer asked.

"It is," said Louie in a low, but clear voice.

"When and how did you lose it?"

About a week ago; I do not know how: it was taken from the mantelpiece of the library."

Do you think it was taken by the prisoner at the bar?" asked Mr. Brougham.

"No, I do not!" was the quick and prompt reply.

"What reason have you for not thinking so?"

Because she is too good a girl to stoop to such a thing."

There was a murmer of applause from all parts of the room.

"Thank you," said the old lawyer to Louie. "Your answer shows a pure and good heart. One more question: Who was the first person to throw suspicion on your teacher?"

"Mr. Jackson," was the prompt reply.

"And was it he who gave the girl such a bad character?"

Mr. Jackson, the lawyer, sprang to his feet, but before he could say a word, Louie answered:

"It was."

"I thought so," said Mr. Brougham. "That will do, miss."

If Mrs. Wilson's and Alfreda's looks were an indication of their feelings toward Lhie, it was lucky for her that she was in a place where they could not be expressed in words.

Mrs. Callaghan was the next to take the stand.

"What is your name?" asked the magistrate.

"My name is it?" Well, its Mary Callahan, and it's an honest name and I am not ashamed of it. Do I know the prisoner? Well, if ye mean the young lady beside her mother there, of course I know her and a swater, kinder lady I never knew, except maybe her mother. How did I come to know her? Well, I'd watched her coming up and going down the stairs. We soon took a great liking to her on account of her pretty ways wid the childer. She always had a smile and a kind worrud for 'em, no matter how dirty or ragged they were. And my own little gurl used to watch for her coming. Well, one day the door of my room was a little bit open, and I saw Miss Alice coming up the stairs in a great hurry, and she looked just ready to die wid fear and trembling, and no wonder for there was a fellow following her. Well, when she got to the top of the stair, instead of flying to her room, she thinks of her sick mother and the shock his ugly mug would give her, so she turned around and faced him."

"Do you see this person in the court room?" asked Mr. Brougham.

"Yes sur, shure there he is skulking behind his broder. I know it's his broder—they're as loike as two peas, one's as ugly as the other, and his name is Jackson."

Every eye was turned toward the brothers. Jackson's face was a study; he was using all his will power in a effort to look unconcerned, but it was a failure, for like clouds passing across the blue sky, so his evil passions would show themselves in his features, in spite of all he could do. Fear, anger, hatred, one after another; fear would blanch his face for a moment, then anger would flush it scarlet, then a look of hatred would flash from his eyes, and he would show his white teeth, firmly set, like a ferocious bull-dog.

"Well, what did he say to her?" asked the lawyer.

"Och! shure I couldn't tell ye all he said, but he was most insulting. First, he asked her if she was ready to marry him."

"And what answer did she return?"

"Shure it was the most sensible ye ever heard: she said she would rather be eaten by several times by the wildest kind of animals than be his wife for a week."

A titter came from all parts of the room, excepting the portion occupied by the Wilsons and the Jacksons.

"The lying wretch," said Alfreda, quite audibly, as she stared at the witness.

Poor Nettie had arisen from her seat; one hand was pressed to her heart, the other grasped the seat in front of her, she was leaning forward with open mouth, and eyes that seemed to be starting from their sockets. She appeared to be unconscious of everything save the woman's word's.

The witness continued: "Well, sur, ye never heard such abuse as he gave her; he said she should go to the poor-house and to prison, and should starve and be ruined unless she'd marry him. Well, I kept getting madder and madder as I heard him abuse that swate young crater, and at last when he tried to force his way to her room in spite of her, my Irish was up so that I couldn't shtond it any longer, so I stepped out of my room and gave him a piece of my mind and a bucket of dish-water at the same time." (Roars of laughter and applause.)

When order was restored, the witness, who had not even smiled during the interruption, went on:

"Then he was going to have me arrested, but he didn't."

"Then you do not think that Miss Alice would steal, from what you know of her?"

"I don't like to be even asked sich a question, sur. I'd as soon believe that Father Matthew would be keeping a saloon."

"Have you ever seen her wearing a diamond bracelet, like the one in question?"

"Never. She don't wear ornaments. And maybe they ain't dimends. Mrs. Wilson didn't know."

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, she can't tell a diamond from a piece o' glass. She was wrong once before. It was cook at the boarding-house where she lived when she was a shop-girl, and she took a fancy to a breast-pin I used to wear. Callaghan gave it to me when he was courting me, and she axed me would I lind it to her to wear at a party, and says I, 'I will, but ye must be careful wid it, for I sit great store by it.' Says she, 'I will, Mary, for I see it's a very costly brooch and real dimends.' Oh, but it did sparkle most elegant then, so I thought more than ever of the pin, and locked it up every night. And I was worreted to think he would shpend so much money to buy dimends for the loikes o' me. Well, bedad, after we were married, one day I was crying because I'd lost one of the sthones out of it. When says he to me, 'I wouldn't cry, Mary, about it, shure, the whole thing only cost seventy-five cents, and I'll get ye another.'"

Mrs. Wilson's face was ablaze with blushes. "What an infamous story," she exclaimed. I never saw the woman in my life before. I do not know her."

"Not now," said the Irishwoman. "I don't expect you to, now you're in luck. But, faith, you were glad to know me then, when you had only four dollars a week for everything, and had hardly a shoe to your fut."

The Judge made a gesture of impatience, and Mr. Brougham said, "That will do, Mrs. Callaghan."

REDEEMING SLUM CHILDREN.

Many years ago, the Five Points House of Industry was established in the slums of New York for the purpose of rescuing the child victims of vice, degradation, and poverty. In forty years it has taught, fed, and sheltered thousands of little ones; 45,000 children have been educated in its day-school, and a temporary home has afforded shelter for several thousand destitute women.

It was lately discovered that the main building was resting on insecure foundations, causing the walls to settle to such an extent that the building had to be torn down. This deprived the House of Industry of its chapel, school-rooms, sleeping-rooms, and play-rooms, and compelled the managers to provide accommodations for one hundred children elsewhere. It is proposed to erect a new building with accommodations for at least 500 children, and money for that purpose is now being raised. The Home of Industry is undenominational. Mr. Hugh N. Camp, New York City, is Treasurer.

Taking

it for granted that you want to get the best results in painting, you will have to use Pure White Lead to obtain them. There are many mixtures branded "White Lead," "Pure White Lead," etc., which contain little, if any, White Lead, but are principally barytes, which is of little value, if not worthless. To be sure, accept only a genuine brand (see list).

If you want any shade of color, tint the White Lead with National Lead Co.'s tinting colors, prepared expressly for this purpose. A feature of these colors is the ease with which they are used and the exactness with which the desired shade is obtained. For particulars send for pamphlet, free.

We Direct Special Attention to the following Remarkable Statement:

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment.

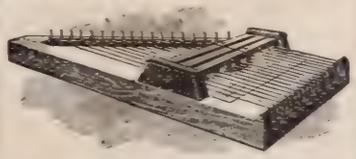
The Autoharp

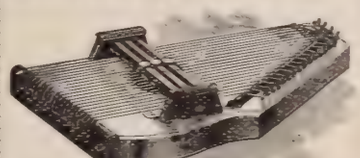
"A Child Musician, Perfectly Capable of Playing the Autoharp in Half an Hour."—EASY TO PLAY. Chapter I.

The range in price is $1.50 to $150. If you doubt your ability there is very little risk in trying one of the smaller instruments. We are confident that it will please you.



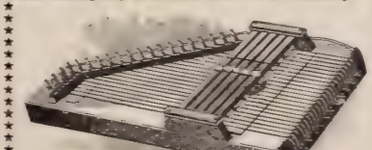
Style Harmonette, Price $1.50.

Three Chord Bars, 15 strings. Instruction book containing six pieces of music, tuning key, imitation tortoise-shell pick. Nicely packed. Send money-order, postal note or stamps. Send 6 cents extra if you wish it sent by mail.



Style No. 1, Price $4.00.

Highly polished redwood sprnce soundingboard, 21 strings, 3 bars, producing the following chords: C-Major, G-Seventh, F-Major. A music book containing 25 pieces of music, brass spiral pick and tuning key furnished with each Autoharp.



Style 2 3-4, Price $5.00.

Highly polished redwood spruce soundingboard, 23 strings, 4 bars, producing the following chords: C-Major, F-Major, B-Major, G-Seventh and C-Seventh. Contains three spirit levels, double rack instructing book, containing 25 pieces music, tuning key, brass spiral pick furnished with every Autoharp.

The chords are made for the player by a simple pressure of the finger upon the chord-bar, and a sweep of the strings with the other hand. The practise is pleasure because no discord is possible. The music words go sentence with the Autoharp, are, "Easy to Play." The tone is soft, sweet and pure, or strong, resonant and noble; and the instrument has wonderful possibilities under the touch of a skilful hand.

If you cannot secure these styles of your local dealer, we will send C. O. D. We prepay express charges to any point in the United States on all Autoharps (except on the Harmonette), if money is sent with order; and an Autoharp can be returned if it does not prove satisfactory and money refunded.

Send for Illustrated Story, "How the Autoharp Captured the Family."

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON
QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION
MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY TO THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In Compounding an Insecticide mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and the washing afterward at once demonstrated that the hair was completely removed. We experimented with the new discovery and named it MODENE. Its peculiarity over some of the depilatories heretofore in use, is that it destroys the hair completely, leaving the skin perfectly smooth and natural in appearance. No other preparation can compare for ease, purity, and unfailing efficiency over unwanted hair. Wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth requires the hand or part of limbs may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, and will be found to be removed at each application, and without discomfort or inconvenience. Directions for use in other languages. MODENE DESTROYS HAIR ROOTS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits. Certificates, testimonials and letters of commendation from ladies of the highest social standing will be furnished on application. Sold by druggists, or sent by express, prepaid, securely sealed from observation, on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send number of inches square to be covered, with address plainly written. Correspondence strictly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR DRUGGIST AND THIS PAPER.) Cut this advertisement out.

BRIGHTENING LOWLY LIVES.

College Graduates and Refined Men and Women in the University Settlements Following Christ's Example of Self-abnegation in the Interest of the Poor.

An important meeting was held in New York a few days ago, which to the philosophic observer was a most significant sign of the times. It was a meeting to denounce and protest against what has been aptly called the heresy of Cain, and to discuss the results of certain efforts which have been made in various cities in this country and in England to counteract its influence. The meeting was composed of men and women of culture and refinement, many of them wealthy, and nearly all of them college graduates. Representatives were present from London, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, and other cities, who came to compare notes of their work with New York workers and with each other, to decide if the plans adopted and the success that had attended them. Heresy-hunters, as a rule, do not have much sympathy from the most intelligent and broad-minded class in the community, but in this particular so far instance, the settlement and more Christ-like movements, the more likely they are to avoid these errors of God-speed. The heresy of Cain was expressed in his reply to God, question about Abel. He said, 'Am I my brother's keeper?' He implied that it was no concern of his what was his brother's condition, and that there were no obligations on the fellowship which he ought to fulfill. Unfortunately this heresy has been very prevalent since Cain's day, so that it has become a common saying, that one half of the world does not know how the other half lives. Christ vigorously protested against it by word and deed. He made it the text of his parable of the Good Samaritan, and his whole life and his death were a concrete antidote to it. In these days, when Christ's life and teaching are better understood than ever before, this fact has been realized, and the Christian conscience has been stirred. Never before have such large sums been expended in charity, and for a time the conscience was appeased. But it soon became evident to the more thoughtful minds that gifts of money were not a sufficient, even if they were a wise means of dealing with the problem of poverty. Fraternal obligations cannot be discharged by a money payment, even if it were made with delicacy. Something more had to be done if the poor brother was to be redeemed from the worst evils of his poverty. The very idea of redemption suggested the next step. Christ's way of redemption was to come down among men and live and die among them, and it is by following his example that the present effort to help the poor is being made.

The College and University Settlement is distinctly Christ-like in its principles and conduct. A house is rented in some crowded neighborhood, where the evils of poverty are felt by every resident. It is plainly, but tastefully furnished, and a certain number of refined and cultured people go and live in it for longer or shorter terms, and some live there permanently. They are hospitable and are soon on good terms with their neighbors, whose visits they welcome. The silent example of cleanliness, order and neatness, exerts an influence for good, the effects of which are soon visible. Respect and confidence are begotten as the acquaintance grows. It is soon known throughout the neighborhood, that the people at the Settlement are nice, kindly people whose advice in a difficulty is worth having, and whose sympathy in any trouble is assured. No attempt is made to preach to the people, or lecture them, but simple neighborly kindness and ready helpfulness. If the young people want to form any society for amusement or education, they know that at the Settlement there are rooms which they will be welcome to use to meet in. There are books there, too, which one may borrow, and they have sometimes pictures which are well worth seeing. There is generally a piano in one of the rooms and, once in awhile, some of the friends of the residents come to see them and there is quite a musical party, at which the neighbors who may like music are welcome. Altogether, life is much brighter down in a rear street for any of the dwellers there who are sufficiently acquainted with the people at the Settlement to visit there, and it is not at all difficult to make their acquaintance. At first it is a quiet, normal life for these cultured people who take up their abode at the Settlement, but after confidence is gained and opportunities open, it becomes a very busy, active life. Children come there to hold their societies or clubs, a kindergarten is organized. Girls who have been all day in the store or factory find the Settlement a pleasant place to pass the evening, and there are nicely dressed, gentle mannered ladies there whom it is a pleasure to know. Girls' societies for sewing or music or cooking are formed. Big boys like to go into the gymnasium and use the Indian clubs or the dumbbells belonging to the gentlemen at the Settlement, and they, too, get up a club that is much better than hanging around street-corners at night or going to a saloon. The development of the Settle-

WING AND HAND.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., preached last Sunday on the Text: Ezekiel 10: 21, "The likeness of the hands of a man was under their wings."

WHILE tossed on the sea between Australia and Ceylon, I first particularly noticed this text, of which then and there I made memorandum. This chapter is all a-flutter with cherubim. Who are the cherubim? An order of angels radiant, mighty, all-knowing, adoring, worshipful. When painter or sculptor tried in temple at Jerusalem, or in marble of Egypt to represent the cherubim, he made them part lion, or part ox, or part eagle. But much of that is an unintended burlesque of the cherubim whose majesty, and speed, and splendor we will never know until lifted into their presence we behold them for ourselves, as I pray by the pardoning grace of God we all may. But all the accounts Biblical, and all the suppositions human, represent the cherubim with wings, each wing about seven feet long, vaster, more imposing than any plumage that ever floated in earthly atmosphere. Condor in flight above Chimborazo, or Rocky Mountain eagle aiming for the noonday sun, or albatross in play with ocean tempest, presents no such glory. We can get an imperfect idea of the wing of cherubim by the only wing we see—the bird's pinion—which is the arm of the bird, but in some respects more wondrous than the human arm; with power of making itself more light, or more heavy; of expansion and contraction; defying all altitudes and all abysms; the bird looking down with pity upon boasting man as he toils up the sides of the Adirondacks, while the wing with a few strokes puts the highest crags far beneath claw and beak. But the bird's wing is only a feeble suggestion of cherubim's wing. The greatness of that, the rapidity of that, the radiance of that, the Bible again and again sets forth.

My attention is not more attracted by those wings than by what they reveal when lifted. In two places in Ezekiel we are told there were hands under the wings; human hands; hands like ours: "The likeness of the hands of a man was under the wings." We have all noticed the wing of the cherubim, but no one seems yet to have noticed the human hand under the wing. There are whole sermons, whole anthems, whole doxologies, whole millenniums in that combination of hand and wing. If this world is ever brought to God, it will be by appreciation of the fact that supernatural and human agencies are to go together: that which soars, and that which practically works; that which ascends the heavens, and that which reaches forth to earth; the joining of the terrestrial and the celestial; the hand and the wing. We see this union in the construction of the Bible. The wing of inspiration is in every chapter. What realms of the ransomed earth did Isaiah fly over? Over what battle-fields for righteousness; what coronations; what dominions of gladness; what rainbows around the throne did St. John hover! But in every book of the Bible you just as certainly [illegible] it. Moses, the lawyer, showing his hand in the Ten Commandments, the [illegible] Adam, the first woman, showing his hand in similes drawn from fields and flocks; the fishermen apostles showing their hand when writing about Gospel nets; Luke, the physician, showing his hand by giving especial attention to diseases cured; Paul showing his scholarly hand by quoting from heathen poets, and making arguments about the Resurrection that stand as firmly as on the day he planted them; and St. John shows his hand by taking his imagery from the appearance of the bright waters spread around the Island of Patmos at hour of sunset, when he speaks of the sea of glass mingled with fire; scores of hands writing the parables, the miracles, the promises, the hosannas, the raptures, the consolations, the woes of ages. Oh, the Bible is so human; so full of heart-beats; so sympathetic; so wet with tears; so triumphant with palm-branches, that it takes hold of the human race as nothing else ever can take hold of it—each writer in his own style: Job, the scientific; Solomon, the royal-blooded; Jeremiah, the despondent; Daniel the abstemious and heroic—why, we know their style so well that we need not look to the top of the page to see who is the author. No more conspicuous the uplifting wing of inspiration than the hand, the warm hand, the flexible hand, the skilful hand of human instrumentality. "The likeness of the hands of a man was under the wings."

Again, behold this combination of my text in all successful Christian work. We stand or kneel in our pulpits, and social meetings, and reformatory associations, offering prayer. Now, if anything has wings, it is prayer. It can fly farther and faster than anything I can now think of. In one second of time from where you sit it can fly to the throne of God and alight in England. In one second of time from where you sit it can fly to the throne of God, and alight in India. It can girdle the earth in a shorter time than you can seal a letter, or clasp a belt, or hook an eye. Wings, whether that prayer starts from an infant's tongue, or the trembling lip of a centenarian, rising from the heart of a farmer's wife standing at the dashing churn, or before the hot breath of a country oven, they soar away, and pick out of all the shipping of the earth, on all the seas, the craft on which her sailor boy is voyaging. Yea, prayer can fly clear down into the future. When the father of Queen Victoria was dying, he asked that the infant Victoria might be brought while he sat up in bed; and the babe was brought, and the father prayed, "If this child should live to become Queen of England, may she rule in the fear of God!" Having ended his prayer, he said, "Take the child away." But all who know the history of England for the last fifty years know that the prayer for that infant more than seventy years ago has been answered, and with what emphasis and affection millions of the Queen's subjects have this day in chapels and cathedrals, on land and sea, supplicated, "God save the Queen!" Prayer flies not only across continents, but across centuries. If prayer had only feet, it might run here and there and do wonders. But it has wings, and they are as radiant of plume, and as swift to rise, or swoop, or dart, or circle, as the cherubim's wings which swept through Ezekiel's vision. But, Oh, my friends, the prayer must have the hand under the wing, or it may amount to nothing. The mother's hand, or the father's hand, must write to the wayward boy as soon as you can hear how to address him. Christian souls must contribute to the evangelism of that far-off land for which they have been praying. Stop singing, "Fly abroad, thou mighty Gospel," unless you are willing to give something of your own means to make it fly. Have you been praying for the salvation of a young man's soul? That is right; but also extend the hand of invitation to come to a religious meeting. It always excites our sympathy to see a man with his hand in a sling. We ask him, "What is the matter? Hope it is not a felon;" or, "Have your fingers been crushed?" But nine out of ten of all Christians are going their life-long with their hand in a sling. They have been hurt by indifference, or wrong ideas of what is best; or it is injured of conventionalities; and they never put forth that hand to lift, or help, or rescue any one. They pray, and their prayer has wings, but there is no hand under the wings. From the very structure of the hand, we might make up our mind as to some of the things it was made for: to hold fast, to lift, to push, to pull, to help, and to rescue. And endowed with two hands, we might take the broad hint that for others as well as for ourselves we were to hold fast, to lift, to push, to pull, to help, to rescue. Wondrous hand! You know something of the "Bridgewater Treatises." When Reverend Francis Henry Bridgewater in his will left $40,000 for essays on "The Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God, as Manifested in the Creation," and Davies Gilbert, the President of the Royal Society, chose eight persons to write eight books, Sir Charles Bell, the scientist, chose as the subject of his great book, "The Hand: Its Mechanism and Vital Endowments as Evincing Design." Oh, the hand! Its machinery beginning at the shoulder, and working through shafts of bone, upper arm and forearm, down to the eight bones of the wrist, and the five bones of the palm, and the fourteen bones of the fingers and thumb, and composed of a labyrinth of muscle, and nerve, and artery, and flesh, which no one but Almighty God could have planned or executed. But how suggestive when it reached down to us from under the wings of the cherubim! "The likeness of the hands of a man was under the wings."

This idea is combined in Christ. When he rose from Mt. Olivet, he took wing. All up and down his life you see the uplifting divinity. It glowed in his forehead. It flashed in his eyes. Its cadences were heard in his voice. But he was also very human. It was the hand under the wing that touched the woes of the world, and took hold of the sympathies of the centuries. Watch his hand before it was spiked. There was a dead girl in a governor's house, and Christ comes into the room and takes her pale, cold hand in his warm grasp, and she opens her eyes on the weeping household, and says, "Father, what are you crying about? Mother, what are you crying about?" The Book says, "He took her by the hand, and the maid arose." A follower, angered at an insult offered Christ, drew the sword from sheath and struck at a man with the sharp edge, aiming, I think, at his forehead. But the weapon glanced aside and took off the right ear at its roots. Christ with his hand reconstructed that wonderful organ of sound, that whispering gallery of the soul, that collector of vibrations, that arched way to the auditory nerve, that tunnel without which all the musical instruments of earth would be of no avail. The Book says, "He touched his ear and healed him." Meeting a full-grown man who had never seen a sunrise, or a sunset, or a flower, or the face of his own father or mother, Christ moistens the dust from his own tongue, and stirs the dust into an eye-salve, and with his own hands applies the strange medicament, and suddenly all the colors of earth and sky rush in upon the newly-created optic nerve, and the instantaneous noon drove out the long night. When he sees the grief [illegible] and Martha, he sits down and cr[illegible] them. Some say it is the shortest [illegible] the Bible; but to me it seems, be[illegible] its far-reaching sympathies, about t[illegible] est—"Jesus wept!" So very hum[illegible] could not stand the sight of dropsy[illegible] lepsy, or paralysis, or hunger, or de[illegible] but he stretches out his sympathe[illegible] toward it. So very, very human. [illegible] tent, and majestic, and glorious, th[illegible] of the New Covenant, with wings[illegible] of encircling a universe, and yet [illegible] gentleness, hands of helpfulnes[illegible] hands of a man under the wings." [illegible] a kind of religion in our day that [illegible] rebukes. There are men and wome[illegible] ing their time in delectation over th[illegible] state, going about from prayer-m[illegible] prayer-meeting, and from church t[illegible] telling how happy they are. But sh[illegible] a subscription paper, or ask them t[illegible] visit the sick, or tell them to reclai[illegible] derer, or speak out for some u[illegible] Christian enterprise, and they ha[illegible] chitis, or stitch in the side, or sudd[illegible] of grippe. Their religion is all w[illegible] no hand. They can fly heavenw[illegible] they cannot reach out earthward.

While Thomas Chalmers occ[illegible] Chair of Moral Philosophy in St.[illegible] University, he had at the same ti[illegible] bath School class of poor boys do[illegible] slums of Edinburgh. While Lor[illegible] ald was traveling in Canada, he s[illegible] Indian squaw carrying a crushing [illegible] he took the burden on his own s[illegible] That was Christ-like. That was [illegible] under the wing." The highest t[illegible] ligion says little about itself, but is [illegible] God and in helping to the heave[illegible] the crew and passengers of this sl[illegible] ed planet. Such people are bus[illegible] the dark lanes of this city, and al[illegible] the mountain glens, and down in [illegible] ries where the sunlight has neve[illegible] and amid the rigging, helping t[illegible] another reef before the Carribe[illegible] wind. A friend was telling me [illegible] quisite thing about Seattle, then [illegible] ing Territory, now of Washingt[illegible] The people of Seattle had raised a [illegible] sum of money for the Johnstown [illegible] from the flood. A few days afte[illegible] was destroyed by fire. I saw it [illegible] whole city were living in tents. [illegible] lic meeting some one proposed [illegible] money raised for Johnstown be [illegible] the relief of their own city, and th[illegible] No! No! No! Send the money [illegible] town, and by acclamation the m[illegible] so sent. Nothing more beautiful [illegible] than that. Under the wing of fire t[illegible] Seattle the sympathetic hand, th[illegible] hand, the mighty hand of Christia[illegible] people thousands of miles awa[illegible] there are a hundred thousand me[illegible] men whose one business is to he[illegible] Helping hands, inspiring hanc[illegible] hands, emancipating hands, savi[illegible] Sure enough, those people had wing[illegible] and wings of prayer, and wings [illegible] lation, but "the likeness of the h[illegible] man was under the wings." T[illegible] much sense in that which the rot[illegible] man said when three were in a b[illegible] coast in a sudden storm that [illegible] sink the boat, and one suggested [illegible] all kneel down in the boat to pra[illegible] robust man took hold of the oar [illegible] to pull, saying, "Let you, the str[illegible] fellow, lay hold the other oar, a[illegible] weak one who cannot pull give h[illegible] to prayer." Pray by all means; [illegible] same time pull with all your mig[illegible] world's rescue. An Arctic travele[illegible] beaver while the ice was breakin[illegible] supposing that there was no hu[illegible] within a hundred miles, hear[illegible] crackle, and lo! a lost man, in[illegible] hunger and cold, was wading [illegible] water. The explorer took the ma[illegible] canoe and made for land, and[illegible] ple gathered on the shore. All t[illegible] ers had been looking for the lost [illegible] finding him, according to prearr[illegible] all the bells rang, and all the g[illegible] Oh, you can make a gladder ti[illegible] th owers and hilltops of heaven if you can fet home a wanderer.

I our time it is the habit to denounce the cit , and to speak of them as the perdition of l wickedness. Is it not time for some on to tell the other side of the story and to sa that the city is the heaven of practical he fulness? Look at the embowered and fo tained parks, where the invalids may co e and be refreshed; the Bowery Mission, th ugh which annually over 100,000 come to t bread for this life, and bread for the if come, all the pillows of that institu under the blessing of Him who had not w e to lay his head; the free schools, w e the most impoverished are educated; th hospitals for broken bones; the homes fo e restoration of intellects astray; the O an House, father and mother to all w come under its benediction; the Mid- t Missions, which pour mid-noon upon th arkened; the Prison Reform Associa- ; the Houses of Mercy; the Infirmaries; th Sheltering Arms; the Aid Societies; the t strial Schools; the Sailors' Snug Har- b the Foundling Asylums; the Free Dis- p aries, where greatest scientific skill te the pulse of wan pauper; the Ambu- l e, the startling stroke of its bell clear- in the way to the place of casualty; and g d souls like the mother who came to the H ward Mission, with its crowd of friend- le boys picked up from the streets, and s ng, "If you have a crippled boy, give hi to me: my dear boy died with the sa e complaint," and such an one she fo d and took him home and nursed him th e was well. It would take a sermon th weeks long to do justice to the mighty th gs which our cities are doing for the u tunate and the lost. Do not say that Cistianity in our cities is all show, and ta and genuflexion, and sacred noise. W have been so long looking at the hand of cruelty, and the hand of theft, and the ha of fraud, and the hand of outrage, that w have not sufficiently appreciated the ha of help, stretched forth from the doors w windows of churches, and from mer- il institutions, the Christ-like hand, the Rubic hand, "the hand under the wings." Th ere is also in my subject the sugges- io of rewarded work for God and righte- us ess. When the wing went the hand wa . When the wing ascended the hand as nded; and for every useful and Chris- ti hand there will be elevation celestial an eternal. Expect no human gratitude, fo it will not come. That was a wise th g Fenelon wrote to his friend: "I am v glad, my dear, good fellow, that you a pleased with one of my letters which h been shown to you. You are right in s ng and believing that I ask little of men in general. I try to do much for them and to ex ct nothing in return. I find a decided ad- v tage in these terms. On these terms I d them to disappoint me." But, my hear er the day cometh when your work, which pe aps no one has noticed, or rewarded, or onored, will rise to Heavenly recogni io. While I have been telling you that th hand was under the wing of the cheru bi I want you to realize that the wing w over the hand. Perhaps reward may co come to you right away. Washington lo more battles than he won, but he tri- u hed at the last. Walter Scott, in boy- h d, was called "The Greek Blockhead:" bu what height of renown did he not after w d tread? And I promise you victory fu her on and higher up; if not in this w d, then in the next. Oh, the Heavenly da when your lifted hand shall be gloved w what honors, its fingers enringed w what jewels, its wrist clasped with w t splendors! Come up and take it, you C istian woman, who served at the wash- tu Come up and take it, you Christian sh -maker, who pounded the shoe-last. Co e up and take it, you professional nurse, w se compensation never fully paid for br en nights and the whims and struggles of delirious sick-rooms. Come up and ta it, you firemen, besweated, far down ar l the greasy machinery of ocean steam- er and ye conductors and engineers on ra oads, that knew no Sunday, and whose ringing bells and loud whistle never warn- ed off your own anxieties. Come up and take it, you mothers, who rocked and lulla- bied the family brood until they took wing for other nests, and never appreciated what you had done and suffered for them. Your hand was well favored when you were young, and it was a beautiful hand, so well rounded, so graceful that many admired and eulogized it; but hard work calloused it, and twisted it, and self-sacrificing toil for others paled it, and many household griefs thinned it, and the ring which went on only with a push at the marriage altar, now is too large, and falls off, and again and again you have lost it. Poor hand! Weary hand! Worn-out hand! But God will reconstruct it, re-animate it, readorn it, and all heaven will know the story of that hand. What fallen ones it lifted up! What tears it wiped away! What wounds it bandaged! What lighthouses it kindled! What storm-tossed ships it brought into the Pearl-beached Harbor! Oh, I am so glad that in the vision of my text, Ezekiel saw the wing above the hand. Roll on that everlasting rest for all the toiling, and misunderstood, and suffering, and weary children of God, and know right well that to join your hand, at last emancipated from the struggle, will be the soft hand, the gentle hand the triumphant hand of Him who wipeth away all tears from all faces. That will be the Palace of the King of which the poet sang in somewhat Scotch dialect:

It's a bonnie, bonnie warl' that we're livin' in the noo,
An' sunny is the lan' we aften travel thro';
But in vain we look for something to which oor hearts can cling.
For its beauty is as naething to the Palace o' the King
We see oor frien's await us ower yonder at his gate:
Then let us a' be ready, for ye ken it's gettin' late;
Let oor lamps be brichtly burnin'; let's raise oor voice an' sing: [King.
Soon we'll meet, to part nae mair, i' the Palace o' the CHINESE SUPERSTITION.

A strange superstition connected with funeral ceremonies in China is reported by Mrs. Hudson Taylor (formerly Geraldine Guinness), who is now traveling in that country. She writes: "We have just passed two men wheeling a coffin with its silent occupant southward upon a barrow. Probably he was some Hu-peh man who had died away from home. On the top of the coffin they are carrying a white cock in a bamboo cage. It is supposed to have some happy effect upon the condition of the dead man's soul. The way of it is this: One of the three spirits of the departed passes into the ancestral tablet, one into the new body, and one is buried in the grave. The white cock on the coffin is to secure the attendance of the proper spirit to the grave for burial. But whether the presence of the doomed bird is really for the benefit of the deceased, or for that of the men who feast upon it at the end of the journey, must remain an open question." This is only one of many similar heathen superstitions that still prevail in China whereon the Gospel has not yet obtained a foothold.

Brightening Lowly Lives.

ment is determined by circumstances and the needs of the people around it. But it is always wholesome and elevating. The neighbors feel that they have found friends who are ready to help them without patronizing them.

There are now nine of these Settlements in New York City. They differ from each other in the management and in the special features of their work but all are based on the principles we have outlined. Outside New York the plan is also in operation, the best known institutions probably being the Epworth House in Boston which has been furnished and helped by the Epworth League; and the Hull House in Chicago which owes its beneficent influence in a large measure to the wonderful magnetic personality of its chief resident, Miss Jane Addams. Of the New York Settlements one is at 95 Rivington St., which is chiefly managed by ladies; the East Side House at the foot of East 76th St.; the Teetotum in Essex St.; the Riverside in West 69th St.; the All Souls' Friendly House in East 34th St., which is conducted by members of All Souls' Church; the Church Settlement House in Avenue A, established by the Church of the Redeemer; the Union Settlement by the Alumni Club and Students of Union Theological Seminary; the Settlement for Trained Nurses in Henry St., and the original Settlement at 26 Delancey St. This last is a fair type of the College Settlement and a description of it will give an idea of the others.

DR. STANTON COIT.
Founder of the Delancey Street Settlement.

THE LIBRARY IN THE DELANCEY ST. SETTLEMENT.

The Settlement was organized in 1887 under the name of the Neighborhood Guild Already a beginning had been made by Dr. Stanton Coit, whose portrait we give, in an effort to help the boys. He took rooms in that unsavory locality in 1886, and formed a Boys' Club, and soon afterward added a Girls' Club and a Penny Provident Bank. The beneficial influence was soon felt, and as the number of members increased larger quarters were needed. Dr. Coit had accepted an appointment in Europe, and was glad to hand the management over to the University Settlement Society which broadened the work and secured the present location.

The Settlement House, at 26 Delancey street, serves as a residence for workers, as a basis for all the enterprises in which the Society is interested, and as a place of meeting for all who are in any way connected with, or interested in, the Society or the Neighborhood Guild, in any of its departments. The first floor, covering the entire lot, 25x100, contains two large assembly rooms and a gymnasium. On the second floor are the library and reading-rooms, and a large room which is used for club purposes and as a cooking-school. On the same floor are the lavatories. On the third floor are two large rooms and one smaller room, used for clubs and classes. The top floor is used exclusively by the residents, and includes a sitting-room, dining-room, three bed-rooms, pantry, kitchen, etc. The expenditure of considerable money was necessary to put the house in repair and furnish it, but the establishment is now in good order, and there are never less than three workers in residence.

The Settlement has, as its President, Hon. Seth Low, President of Columbia College, and as its Head Worker, Mr. J.B.Reynolds, whose enthusiasm and energy have contributed largely to its success. Some idea of the activities which centre in the Settlement may be had from the following list of Societies under its auspices: The Improvement Club for girls between the ages of eighteen and twenty-four, which has classes for physical culture, dress-making and home-nursing; the Social, Educational, and Improvement Club for young men, which has charge of several classes indicated by its title; the Little Women's Club; the Order Club; the Mayflower Club, and the Daisy Chain Club—all for the children; The Literary Society; The Order Club and Social Reform Club for the older members Besides these, there are free legal and medical advice bureaus, and many other agencies of helpfulness. There are six residents at the Settlement, and even during the heat of the summer, its close rooms were not deserted. Two or three of the workers were always there, and similar arrangements are being made for this season.

The result of the experiment has been altogether satisfactory. The testimony of Mr. Reynolds, the head-worker in Delancey Street, agrees with that of the workers in other districts and in other cities that the effect on the workers is as beneficial as on those they are trying to help. There is a better understanding on both sides that has come from the close acquaintance and could come in no other way. The defects that have been found in the society of the East side are not so much moral defects as those that come from lack of education and the carelessness that comes from overcrowding. The Settlement furnishes an object lesson in cleanliness and order that is followed without any urging on the part of its residents. And the Settlement has been able to render direct help. In living in the neighborhood, the residents have had the gross partiality of the municipal officers forced on their attention. The people of Delancey street have the same rights that the people of Fifth avenue have to the attentions of the street-cleaning bureau, but they never received them to the same extent until pressure was applied from the Settlement, as it could never be applied from the tenement-house. In this and numberless ways opportunities have been found for doing useful service, and on both sides affection has been developed, and the essential brotherhood of humanity has been realized.

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.

S. S. Lesson for June 2. Mark 16 : 1 - 8. Golden Text Luke 24:34. By Mrs. Baxer.

"THE Lord is risen indeed," was the Easter greeting of the early Christians; and O, how much it means to every child of man! And yet his chosen twelve were "slow of heart to believe!" Never having taken in the fact that their Lord must die for sinners, they were unprepared to take in the tremendous fact, that he, to whom it was appointed once to die (Heb. 9 : 27), in the name and character of every sinner for his every sin, should yet rise superior to, and Conqueror over death. "Death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned, and pre-eminently, death passed upon the Son of man, who, sinless as he was identified himself with every sinner.

In him was life, and having passed through death, he can then speak of himself: "I am the First and the Last, and the Living One: and I was dead, and behold, I am alive for evermore." (Rev. 1 : 17, 18.) "Because I live, ye shall live also." (John 14 : 13.) Just as truly as he identified himself with us in his death and in his resurrection. It is "the power of his resurrection" which we need for a Christ-like life, a continual oneness and a communion with a risen Saviour interceding for us in heaven, and also dwelling in us as we live over again his life on earth of "God . . . manifest in the flesh." (1. Tim. 3 : 16.)

So unbelieving were the women who had looked on afar off when he was crucified, that "when the Sabbath was past, they bought sweet spices that they might come and anoint the body of Jesus!" (Mark 15 : 40; 16 : 1.) The scoffing chief priests and Pharisees had manifested much more faith than they. After the body of Jesus was laid in the sepulchre, they had gone to the chief priests, and said:

"Sir, we Remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I will rise again." (Matt. 27 : 63.) And they obtained permission to seal the stone which formed the sepulchre, and to set a guard of soldiers, to prevent what they alleged as their fear, that his disciples should steal him away under cover of the darkness, and by saying that he was risen from the dead, establish his Messiahship. They remembered, and the disciples forgot! They saw the bearing of such a phenomenon as the resurrection of Jesus; they knew that all their opposition to him must be overthrown, and that every impartial mind must bow before it, it such a fact were established. And yet, at the very hour when these rulers were taking precautions against his resurrection, the women who had ministered unto him were thinking of some process of embalming that they might preserve the body which he had again and again declared would rise from the dead! Things had not happened as they expected, and instead of remaining still, and recalling all that he had said, or searching the Scriptures to find out how far he was fulfilling the prophecies, they acted as though there were no ground for further hope, and they contented themselves with paying their last respects to the dead!

Is not this a type of many children of God in the present day, who have prayed for, and sighed for, the power of a Christ-like life? They have followed the Lord, come out from the world, taken his part in many ways. But an unexpected turn of circumstances has arisen, and they are disappointed. Like the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, when they said: "We trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel" (Luke 24 : 21), they have given up hope. They thought to have had something more, to have some conscious proof of God's power in them, and instead, all seems failure and nothingness. With useless regrets they bring spices to embalm the dead, they mourn over former zeal and usefulness, and speak sadly of disappointed hopes of spiritual power and grace. "To the Word and to the testimony." O, if they did but go by the Word they would see this death was the way to resurrection, that if we are united with him by the likeness of his death we shall be also of his resurrection. (Rom. 6: 5.) But this can only be, "knowing that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be done away that henceforth we should not serve sin" (ver. 6), and that therefore we have no more to expect from ourselves.

There was nothing acceptable to God in the sweet spices of the women; this was no ministering to the Lord—it was the fruit of unbelief. All sentimental sighing and weeping over our shortcomings is just as unacceptable to him. True grief for our unchristliness results in a deep study of his Word in his own presence, that we may find our way out of what grieves him and wrongs his character, and an implicit faith in that which we find written. Fleshly, sentimental sorrow can still tolerate what it mourns over; but one who is conquered by Christ cannot tolerate what is unlike him: "he purifieth himself even as he is pure." (I. John 3: 3.) The women found only trouble and difficulty. Unlike Mary Magdalene, who had come first to the sepulchre when it was yet dark (John 20: 1; Mark 16: 9), these, her companions, waited till the sun was risen (verse 2), and as they drew near, a difficulty presented itself: "Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the tomb?" (R.V.) And when they did look up, away from their difficulties and they saw a young man sitting on the right side arrayed in a white robe (life in the place of death), "they were amazed." (R. V., "affrighted.") And when this heavenly messenger said to them: "Be not amazed; ye seek Jesus, the Nazarene, which hath been crucified. He is risen; he is not here: behold the place where they laid him! But go tell his disciples and Peter he goeth before you into Galilee: then shall ye see him, as he said unto you." Instead of being filled with joy, they went out and fled from the tomb, for trembling and astonishment had come upon them, and they said nothing to anyone (they did not even deliver the angel's message), for they were afraid.

Why was this? "As yet they knew not the Scripture that he must rise again from the dead." (John 22: 9.) When the Lord had opened the understanding of his disciples that they should understand the Scriptures, Jesus and the resurrection became their constant theme. In Peter's sermon, at the very time of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, the apostle founds his whole argument as to the messiahship of the Lord Jesus, on the fact of his resurrection, as foretold by David in Psalm 16, which he insisted was a prophecy of the Messiah. David's flesh did see corruption while the body of God's Christ was not left in Hades, neither did his flesh see corruption. (Acts 2: 29-36.) And Paul used the same argument to the Jews in Iconium.

It was the doctrine of Christ's resurrection which aroused all the enmity of the priests, the captain of the temple, and the Sadducees, when Peter had been God's instrument in the healing of the lame man at the gate of the temple and had declared how God had glorified his Son Jesus: "Whom God raised from the dead whereof we are witnesses. And his name through faith in his name hath made this man strong whom ye see and know." (Acts 3: 13-16; 4: 2.) But God bore witness to this testimony, so that "with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, and great grace was upon them all." (Acts 4: 33.)

The resurrection of Christ was the touchstone for the cultured, but heathen Athenian (Act 17: 18, 32), as much as it was of the professedly Scripture-loving Jews. Paul understood perhaps as much as any man who ever lived, all it meant for the salvation and regeneration of a world and for his own soul. But perhaps we have never fully taken in all which is included in the summary of his teaching which he gives in Acts 26: 22, when he stood before Agrippa: "Having therefore attained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come: that Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead; and should shew light unto the people and to the Gentiles."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THEY CAME EARLY TO THE SEPULCHRE.

TOO much emphasis cannot be given to the fact of the resurrection of Jesus. It is not safe to leave any doubt in any child's mind as to the fact, or to leave him in ignorance of the evidence in proof of it. In every generation there have been attempts made to disprove it, or explain it away, and the effort is not likely to be abandoned. If a child is not made acquainted with the evidence, the time is likely to come when he will lose faith in the resurrection as a fact, and with that his faith in all other facts of historical Christianity. The whole superstructure is weakened when that central fact is taken away. To doubt or deny the resurrection, is to imply that the four evangelists who wrote the Gospels, and the Apostles who preached the resurrection, were either mistaken or were conscious deceivers. Either assumption is fatal to their influence, for if their evidence is untrustworthy in so important a matter, it is of no value on anything else. There is therefore every inducement to make a strong defense of this doctrine. And, really, it should not require any great strain of faith to believe that Jesus rose from the dead. To such a life as that described in the Gospels, the resurrection is not an inconsistent sequence. He who believes that Christ lived that singularly beautiful, loving, beneficent life, and that he had the powers he is represented as exercising, can have little difficulty in believing in the resurrection. Then the evidence for the fact is remarkably cogent. The testimony does not read like the testimony of credulous men who might be easily mistaken. In spite of all that Jesus had said, they did not expect the resurrection. The women carried the spices to anoint the dead body, and they found the tomb empty. Their astonishment is natural, and they hurry to tell their friends. It is true they report a vision of angels, but their story is not credited. The disciples investigate for themselves. They go to the tomb and see the grave-clothes laid aside, and still they do not realize the fact. Even when Jesus appears to them, they think they see a ghost, and he has to ask them to touch his hands, and has to eat with them, before, slowly and reluctantly, they admit the fact. It does not seem possible that they could have been mistaken. The supposition of fraud involves still greater difficulties. The Romans made sure that he was dead. The Roman soldier took a brutal way of ascertaining the fact of his death, by driving his lance into the body, thereby inflicting a wound that would have caused death, if it had not already taken place. The body had been laid in a new tomb, so that substitution was impossible. The seal on the stone, and the presence of the Roman guard, must have made it impossible for the friends of Jesus to remove his body. Then, to the fact of his resurrection was openly proclaimed within a short time of its occurrence, and that, too, not in a distant place, but in the very city where it occurred, and where, if the statement was false, there must have been a multitude of witnesses who could expose the fraud. No man can logically accept the resurrection without rejecting altogether the testimony of the Bible writers. But changes had taken place in the body of Jesus or at the resurrection, is implied by the facts recorded. So much for the fact. Our application to it is a practical one. There is no Christian boy or girl who cannot make the resurrection a reality to the world in the way Christ most wished. Christ should be seen in the lives of his followers. By the patience, forbearance, tenderness, and unselfish concern for the welfare of others may prove that Christ is risen again in our lives. If his spirit dominates us, the world will see that there is something supernatural in us. A life may be so beautiful, so unselfish, so beneficent that others may be drawn to Jesus by what they see of the power that life.

Very early the first day of the week. The observance of the first day of the week instead of the seventh day, as the day of religious service, is a standing testimony to the resurrection. There was no command that we know of to change the day, but it seems to have been done spontaneously by the followers of Christ in pure joy over the resurrection. We wonder what could have induced Jewish Christians to change the custom of centuries, and adopt another day for worship, but we wonder no longer when we remember the gladness that must have been associated with the day on which the sorrow was turned into joy by the resurrection of their Lord. "You look glad," said a lady to a carpenter on Saturday, as he was toiling in the hot sun. "You must be glad to-morrow is Sunday." The carpenter wiped his brow, as he answered, "Yes, ma'am, I am about ready for it every week." "I hope you keep the Sabbath," and don't spend it in drinking and playing." The carpenter smiled as he answered, "Oh no, ma'am, I don't keep the Sabbath. I am not a Jew; I am a Christian. I keep the Lord's Day. And it's no Sabbath to me. I am busy all day, from early prayer-meeting in church and Sunday School till night, and I am as much refreshed on Monday morning as if I had loafed around keeping Sabbath."

He goeth before you. Jeremy Taylor, referring to Christ's leadership, says: "It is reported in the Bohemian story that Wenceslaus, their king, one winter's night going to his devotions in a remote church barefooted in the snow and sharpness of unequal and pointed ice, his servant. Rex, who waited upon his master's piety, endeavored to imitate his affections, but soon fainted through the violence of the storm and cold, till the king commanded him to follow him, and set his feet in the same footsteps which his feet should mark for him. The servant did so, and either fancied a way or found one; for he followed his prince close forward with shame and zeal to his imitation, and by the forming footsteps in the snow. In the same manner does the way to Jesus; for since our way is troublesome, obscure, full of objection and danger to be mistaken, and to affright our feet, he commands us to mark his foot prints, and tread where his feet have stood; and he only invites us forward by the argument of his example, but he hath trodden the way much of the difficulty, and made it smooth, easier, and fit for our feet.

He is risen; he is not here. No attempt is made in the Gospels to explain the mystery of the resurrection. We would like to ask what change there was in the risen body; how it was that Mary, who looked on him so intensely, could have mistaken him for the gardener, and many other questions, but no information is given us. We have to get what help we can from analogy. One preacher says: Suppose you have a coin that has been crushed. The coin itself will not be wasted. Perhaps you give it away, and it never comes back to you, but it is not lost. If you had followed it you might, perhaps, have traced it to the bank, then to the mint, where it would be put into the furnace and melted down, and then it would pass through the mill, and come out a bright brand new shining coin. So with the resurrection—the new body will be like the old, but brighter and better.

GOSPEL PROGRESS IN MEXICO.

Mr. Moody Writes to "The Christian Herald" on the Subject—Twenty Years' Evangelical Work Reviewed — The Republic's Spiritual Needs.

DURING his recent evangelistic tour in Mexico, Mr. D. L. Moody, mindful of the interest American Christians have in the sister Republic, secured valuable information as to the progress of Gospel work in that country which he has now communicated to our readers in the following letter:

D. L. Moody

Fort Worth, Tex.
April 27, '95.

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Before leaving Mexico, I asked one of the leading missionaries to write me about the outlook of the work in that Republic and the following is his answer. I thought your readers would be glad to see it and so send it to you. D. L. MOODY.

How the Seed has Multiplied.

My dear Mr. Moody:—I have conferred with Dr. Powell about the matter of Protestantism in Mexico; and, as a result, give you the following notes, which I trust may be of service to you.

First, then, as to the origin of Protestantism in this country: There is no doubt that a great deal of good was done by tracts sent by the American Tract and American Bible Societies with the American Army in 1847 and 1848. Bibles, Testaments and tracts were scattered in the wake of this army in its march from the Rio Grande to the City of Mexico, and although this effort was not followed up immediately by any systematic missionary work, the missionaries in different parts of the country found constantly finding the results of that seed sown." The first American missionary to come into the country was Miss Matilda Rankin of the Congregational Church who, early in the sixties, established a school in Matamoras, Texas, and after acquiring the Spanish language, moved to Monterey, where she established a day and boarding school. After awhile, the older girls who had been trained by Miss Rankin in the knowledge of the Gospels, were sent out into the adjoining towns and villages for the purpose of reading and expounding the Word. From this effort of hers grew up something like a dozen congregations, of which she was the chief pastor. She few years ago, on account of failing health, Miss Rankin returned to her State, Illinois, where she died about two years later. Her work was taken up by other missionaries. Organized missionary work, however, began in the country about 1872, though prior to this date, Rev. H. C. Riley worked under the American and Foreign Christian Union here in the centre of the country, and built up a large number of congregations.

Since the date given above, the Presbyterians, Methodists of both branches, Congregationalists, Baptists, Southern Presbyterians, Associate Reform Presbyterians, Baptists of the Northern Convention, Friends, and Cumberland Presbyterians, have entered the field in about the order mentioned above. There are now twelve mission Boards working in this country, and they have entered every State in the Republic with the single exception of Chiapas.

A Remarkable Showing.

The following is the result of twenty years of systematic evangelical work:

I. THE FIELD.

Number of centres of operation	90
Number of congregations	615
Number of ordained foreign missions	60
Number of assistant foreign missionaries; that is, unordained men, and wives of ordained and assistant missionaries	60
Number of foreign lady teachers	67
Whole number of foreign workers	186
Number of native preachers, ordained	111
Number of native preachers, unordained	164
Number of native teachers	177
Number of other native helpers	94
Whole number of native workers	546
Grand total of foreign and native workers	732

II. THE CHURCHES.

Number of churches organized	444
Number of communicants	17000
Number of probable adherents	50000

III. THE SCHOOL.

Number of training and theological schools	9
Number of students in same	36
Number of boarding schools and orphanages	33
Number of pupils in same	625
Number of common schools	116
Number of pupils in same	6700
Total number under instruction	7336
Number of Sunday Schools	347
Number of Sunday School teachers and officers	694
Number of Sunday School scholars	9815
Total membership of Sunday Schools	10307

IV. PUBLISHING INTERESTS.

Number of publishing houses	10
Number of papers issued	13
Pages of all kinds of religious literature issued since the establishment of our press	159, 948, 246

V. PROPERTIES.

Number of church buildings	118
Approximate value of same (inc. furniture)	$635,550
Number of parsonages	30
Approximate value of same (including society furniture)	$217,900
Number of educational buildings	31
Approximate value of same (including furniture and utensils)	$283,885
Value of publishing outfit	$ 40,150
Total value of all missionary property	$1,101,485

Difficulties Encountered.

It should be remembered that thirty years ago, there was no organized Evangelical church, no Protestant school house, nor church building, in all this republic, and that, until about that date, with the single brief exception, during the march of the American army, it was worth a man's life to be seen with a Bible anywhere in Mexico, and yet, these wonderful results have followed.

These several denominations are working together harmoniously. An evidence of this fact has recently been witnessed in Toluca, where 141 workers from different missions, gathered together for a three days' meeting of conference and prayer. As you were present at nearly all of these sessions, I need hardly add that that gathering was probably the most remarkable of its kind in the history of Protestanism in this country. The workers were drawn nearer together, and received a new inspiration of the great work which lies before us.

The meetings which you and Mr. Sankey have been kind enough to continue since then in this city, have been productive of immense good. Many cold Christians have been quickened, and many wanderers are being brought back into the fold. I think the different missionaries will never cease to be grateful for this great help that you and Mr. Sankey have given to our work among the Mexican people.

QUEEN WILHELMINA IN FRIESLAND DRESS.

The Needs of the Workers.

As to our needs, they are many. Among the most pressing, might be mentioned the following:

The more perfect equipment of our Evangelical press for the publication of books, tracts, and papers. It very often happens that friends in the North can be interested in this work, and furnish money for the publication of these books. One of the most successful instances of this kind was a donation made by a friend of yours in the city of Boston, not many years since, with which we published 5,000 copies of your little book "On Heaven."

It frequently happens, too, that we trace the origin of some church or schoool to the reading of a little tract, and these printed pages are being sent out by millions each year from the evangelical presses now established in the country.

The Rising Generation.

Another one of our great needs is an increased effort along educational lines. We ought to have more schools. The country lies open before us, with its 12,000,000 inhabitants. The rising generation is desirous of receiving education. We can reach these boys and girls by hundreds and thousands, and the 8,000 children now under instruction in the different evangelical churches might be multiplied over and over again, if the necessary funds were forthcoming. We must begin at the foundation. We all feel the need of a strong central University, which should have an inter-denominational character, well established, equipped, and fully endowed.

It has been a great gratification to the missionaries here to note the deep interest that you and Mr. Sankey have taken in our native work. We are sure you will carry it home on your hearts.

Faithfully yours, JOHN M. BUTLER.

A SPIRITUAL REVIVAL AT TOLUCA.

At the closing meeting held by Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey in Toluca, Mexico, testimonies were given by nearly everyone of the missionaries present. Some had come over 1200 miles to attend, and some had grave doubts when they came to the convention that they themselves would receive any special anointing for their work. These particular ones especially gave testimony that they had received great blessing. As the final meeting broke up, all joined hands while singing the old favorite hymn familiar among Christians in every land:

Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in Christian love!

Two wonderfully interesting meetings were held in the great National Theatre at Toluca, at which all the missionaries were present, the galleries being crowded with native Mexicans wearing their blankets and sombreros. Addresses were made by Mr. Moody in English, followed by others in Spanish, and songs were sung by Mr. Sankey, the interest being maintained till a late hour. The most kindly feeling was manifested on the part of the city officials and the people, indicating a widespread liberality of feeling in regard to religious matters. The Governor of the State presented to each minister and missionary through the Rev. Dr. Powell who had initiated and carried through the meetings, an historical volume giving the history of the State.

Meetings were afterwards held in the City of Mexico for ten days, at the conclusion of the Conference, and were largely attended by the English-speaking people of the city, Mr. Moody giving addresses twice a day, followed by Inquiry Meetings, which were well attended.

A CARLYLE MEMORIAL.

GREAT BRITAIN proposes to honor the memory of Thomas Carlyle one of the greatest authors, historians and philosophers the present century has produced, by the purchase of his old home in Cheyne Row, Chelsea, London, which it is suggested shall be ultimately transformed into a Carlyle Museum. It was in this antique-looking dwelling that the philosopher wrote the "Life of Frederick the Great," and in recognition of that fact Emperor William of Germany has sent $500 to the Memorial Committee. Here, too, Carlyle was wont to receive his friends, among them Mazzini, Tennyson, Forster, Dickens, Froude, Ruskin, and many others of world-wide distinction. At a recent meeting in the Mansion House, London (the Lord Mayor's special residence), Mr. Bayard, the United States Minister to England, expressed the warm sympathy Americans felt in the project, and also mentioned the fact that it was on this side of the Atlantic that the great genius of the writer received its first real recognition. Doubtless all the funds needed for the project will speedily be raised and the Museum, which will contain a most interesting collection of Carlyliana, will become an attraction for visitors from all parts of the world.

CARLYLE'S HOME AT CHELSEA.

HOLLAND'S GIRL QUEEN.

YOUNG Queen Wilhelmina, of Holland, whose childish features were several years ago presented in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is now visiting England. She has grown to be quite a young lady of fifteen, or thereabouts. She and young Alfonso, of Spain, are the two "fatherless sovereigns," and as such, are regarded with much interest wherever they go.

Some years ago, Wilhelmina paid a visit to the German Court, where she greatly interested Emperor William, and last autumn she was in Switzerland and the Tyrol. Her full name is Wilhelmina Helen Pauline Marie, and though still a child, she has already worn the Dutch crown for nearly five years. Only child of the second marriage of King William III. with Princess Emma of Waldeck-Pyrmont, the little girl soon after her birth became sole heiress to the throne by the deaths of her half-brothers, the Prince of Orange and Prince Alexander. At the King's decease, Queen Emma was appointed Regent, and has since devoted her life to training up her daughter as a high-minded woman and sovereign. The young Queen does justice to the maternal care, for she is a charming, unaffected girl, bright and lively. She looks rather delicate and is not very tall. She speaks French, English, and German fluently, in addition to her native tongue, having been carefully educated by an English governess. In the native "Friesland dress" (in which she appears in the illustration), she looks very attractive, and has won her the hearts of the people of Holland.

CURIOUS FACTS ABOUT THE BIBLE.

A prisoner confined in solitary confinement obtained a copy of the Bible and by three years' careful study obtained the following facts: The Bible contains 3,586,489 letters, 773,692 words, 31,174 verses, 1,189 chapters and 66 books. The word "and" occurs 46,277 times; the word "Lord" occurs 1,855 times; the word "reverend" occurs but once, which is the 9th verse of the 111th Psalm. The finest chapter to read is the 26th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. The 19th chapter of II. Kings and the 37th chapter of Isaiah are alike. The longest verse is the 9th verse of the 8th chapter of Esther, the shortest verse is the 35th verse of the 11th chapter of John. The 8th, 15th, 21st and 31st verses of the 107th Psalm ends alike. Each of the verses of the 136th Psalm ends alike.

THE COMING BRIGHTNESS.

THE long story of crime and outrage in all parts of the land will go on till you somehow cage this wild beast of the rum traffic. You might as well go out with a bucket at New Orleans to bail the Mississippi River, forgetting that as long as the Ohio and the Missouri and the Arkansas and the Yazoo and eight mighty tributaries poured into it, nothing less than Omnipotence can halt that Father of Waters. Neither can this great Mississippi of crime and outrage be bailed out as long as these one hundred thousand tributaries of iniquity keep pouring in their surges of death. In this great conflict sometimes Christian men and philanthropists get thoroughly discouraged, and you hear the disheartenment in their prayers and exhortations and sermons. In such a mood you are of no use. A soldier who does not expect to win the day might better be outside the regiment. I suggest a healthy thing for you to do. When a long and severe winter is raging, it is most refreshing to go into some art gallery and look at a picture of springtime and see the blossoms, or at a picture of summer and see golden grain-fields, or at a picture of the autumn and see ripe orchards. So if you ever get depressed at the long winter of the world's sin and sorrow, just open your Bible and look at the pictures of the spring, the summer, the autumn of what the world is yet to be, beyond all possibility of disappointment. There is no more doubt about it than that June and July and August are coming. Right after I read in the newspapers the story of the crime and the wretchedness of the world, I want to read Isaiah's description of the time when the whole earth will be a garden. Isaiah describes that coming joy by turning into the same pasture-field leopard and wolf and bear and lion and cow and calf. He turns the den of reptiles into a child's play-ground. The wilderness becomes a blooming park, and Jeremiah and Malachi, and Paul and John and Christ join their voices in presenting the brightness and grandeur and redolence of the world as it shall be. So you cannot discourage me. Neither ought I to be able to discourage you. Is not God stronger than the devil?

Toward the glorious consummation toil, ye with uplifted head and illumined face and exultant spirit, for God will give all who are faithful a share in the final triumph. Every kind word spoken, every prayer [illegible], every good deed done, every [illegible] of righteousness, will give you more and more part in the joy of the great harvest home. Christ will push aside many pretentious workers who won great applause for what they accomplished, to greet some humble disciple with the words: "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, my brethren, ye did it to me." The trouble is that in religion we deal too much in glittering generalities, and do not realize that the most of this work is to be done on a small scale. Do the work next to you. Be satisfied to cultivate your own field; you cannot cultivate mine. Many a man who had but one talent, and rightly used it, will, in the last great day, receive higher reward than the man with five talents or ten talents, who did not properly employ them. Not great philanthropists and great orators and great officials are to save this world. The universal conquest will be the aggregation of the work of two hundred millions.

THE PARDONING POWER.

THERE have been so many cases in which it was demonstrated beyond a doubt that the innocent suffered and the guilty went free, that the Governor who resolves upon abstinence from the exercise of the pardoning power becomes himself the criminal. Sometimes men become the victims of circumstances, and after a life of integrity do just one wrong thing. Punished they must be, but after awhile there comes a time for leniency and release. Sometimes good men are found in suspicious circumstances for which they are in nowise responsible, and are flung into prison, and after awhile the real author of the crime, under pang of conscience or on sick or dying bed, makes confession. Sometimes after a crime is committed the community are so hot with excitement that the jury lose their balance, and are incompetent for a just verdict, and they pronounce those guilty who are not guilty. Sometimes a judge of the court, gouty or dyspeptic or savage, guided by his exasperated nervous system rather than his sense of right, inflicts too long an imprisonment for an offender. Sometimes there are conspiracies against some unfortunate man which do not develop as conspiracies until long after the trial. There is probably not a large penitentiary in the land which does not to-day hold in iron embrace those who deserve the full liberty of good citizenship. What a grand thing when a Governor is willing to put his ear to the wicket of the dungeon and listen to the plaint, and examine the testimony, and finding innocence in bonds, does the work of the angel of God that opened the door of the apostolic imprisonment and set Peter free.

My friend, Governor Blackburn, of Kentucky, entering upon his office at Frankfort, the State capital, found a great mass of convicts huddled together in illy ventilated dungeons. Four persons in a room where there ought to have been only one. Old villains and young boys in the same bunk. No opportunity of ablution. Filthy and rotting alive. Those who were, as a result of the terrible place, in the last stages of consumption, he sent to their homes to die. Those who had been unjustly committed he set free. Light poured into the earthly pandemonium, and while Governor Blackburn did all that the law would allow him to do in the reformation of those who must stay and in the liberation of those who ought to go, his accomplished and Christian wife carried the Gospel of Christ through all the prison corridors and gathered the convicts Sabbath by Sabbath into the chapel, where she put them under the influence of prayer and song and religious exhortation. One of the most gratifying hours of my life was that passed when at the invitation of that Elizabeth Fry, that Florence Nightingale of American prisons, Mrs. Blackburn, I confronted the prisoners with a message of mercy from a pardoning God. He who pardons the most is most like God, who abundantly pardons.

PRAISE AND BLAME.

WHEN we think of the vast railroad system of this country, and that this moment, and every moment, on all the tracks north, south, east, and west, the long trains are rolling and rushing and thundering on, it is a marvel that every morning and every evening newspaper does not present us a long roll of the dead. Let the reprehension of the faithless always be accompanied with applaudits for that multitude of men who on small wages keep the railroading of this country and Great Britain moving in such perfection that an accident is exceptional. One can go from New York to Toronto or Chicago with no more exposure to danger than he meets in crossing our slippery streets on cold nights. The least dangerous mode of travel is the rail-train. More dangerous is it to go in carriage, and in some conditions of streets, most perilous to go afoot. While we are again and again called to denounce the sacrifice of human life, we ought to take every opportunity to praise the fidelity of those who get no recognition of brave work conscientiously performed. There are in our time no grander instances of vicarious suffering than that shown by railroad engineers. I often ride with them on their locomotives, and I am always impressed with their intelligence, their gentlemanliness, and their heroism. You get but little idea of them as you see the train coming in, and with faces and hands and garments smutched of the coal-dust and soiled with the oil of machinery, they lean out of the window of the hissing engine looking for a telegram from the superintendent giving orders about the next run. How much of the life, the wealth and the happiness of the world depends upon their promptness, and how few betray the trust. Let the execrable negligence of the few be the hearty eulogy of the many.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Reader, Sykesville, Pa. Was the wine which Jesus made at the marriage at Cana intoxicating?

In absence of a direct statement in the Gospels we have to be guided by inference. From Christ's character we infer that he would not provide intoxicating wine. The fact of the governor at the feast pronouncing it good, does not imply that it was intoxicating, but merely that it was pleasant to the taste. Your friend's contention as to fermentation is obviously wrong. The process involves the lapse of time. Unfermented wines were certainly in use in Palestine as well as fermented wines.

Subscriber, Tiffin, O. 1. Have we any knowledge as to the origin of the cliff-dwellers? 2. What do verses 4-6 of the sixth chapter of Hebrews mean?

1. The Hayden Survey, sent out by the U.S. Government, explored the cliff dwellings of Arizona and New Mexico, but found very little material upon which to base conclusions as to those prehistoric people. The perforations in the rocks were made by members of the vanished race of whose origin nothing is known, and who had been driven by enemies from the the plains below. They were probably the remote ancestors of the Pueblo Indians. 2. There is a condition of backsliding or apostasy so grievous that there cannot possibly be new means for the renewing afresh in the spiritual life of those who have so fallen away. Twice dead, they are past hope, except by a miracle of God's grace.

Mrs. Lida McCullough, Gosport, Ia. Locate Bethabara and Enon and state the probable distance from the river Jordan.

Bethabara, or "the house of the ford or ferry," was "beyond Jordan," or on the eastern bank of the river. Enon or Ænon, where John baptized, was on the west side of the Jordan, and a short distance from the river, and fifty-three miles northeast of Jerusalem. It is believed by many scholars and investigators to have been on the site of Salim or Shalem, near Nablous, where there are two very copious springs.

J. Renfrew, Alleghany, Pa. Where did "Black Death" originate, and is it identical with the plague which has recently appeared in China?

The mediæval "Black Death" (a virulent typhus), is said to have originated in China, and was first brought to Europe from that country in the fourteenth century by trading caravans, or merchant ships. There had previously been three great pestilences, following famines, in Europe. It is supposed to be identical with the great plague that afflicted Egypt and Greece in the sixth century A. D. The plague mentioned in the dispatches as having broken out in certain Chinese ports after the late war, is probably cholera.

Frederick Martin, Buffalo, N. Y., and several others. Since there is no Scriptural or statutory injunction against the marriage of first cousins, what is the principal objection to such a union?

As this is a question that has been repeatedly asked by readers of THE MAIL BAG, we give a comprehensive answer: Although there is no Scriptural or legal prohibition, there are physiological reasons that should be carefully considered. There are in some families, and even in their collateral branches, evidences of departure from the normal physical, or mental standard. All physiological authorities agree that wherever such evidences are present, intermarriage intensifies the predisposition in the offspring, and that such peculiarities are transmitted in an increased degree. Inherited tendencies are invariably magnified in the children of such unions. This rule is well-nigh absolute, and should be kept well in view in all cases where the union of blood relations is concerned.

Inquirer. Is it wrong for parents to make a leaving to an afflicted child a larger portion than to the other children who are not afflicted?

No; on the contrary, it would be a kind and thoughtful provision to so arrange for the support of an afflicted son or daughter. For other information desired in your letter, write to H. P. Main, 76 E. 9th street, New York.

J. F. D. At what time were public sacrifices discontinued in Palestine?

They were only permitted to be offered in the Temple, and at its destruction by the invading armies of Titus in A. D. 70, they were necessarily discontinued.

Emma Miner, Portland, Me. Kindly decide, for several readers which is the more dignified expression to use, "woman" or "lady?"

Both are right in their respective places. But it is a vulgarism to use the latter term discriminately, as many do. "Woman," however, is the more dignified. Von der Vogelweide, the German poet, expressed this sentiment when he wrote,

"Woman" must ever be woman's highest name,
And honors more than "Lady."

E. Callicott, St. Paul, Minn. Do the Armenian Christians hold the same religious belief with the Christian people of Europe and America?

In many important points, their belief is the same, although there are others on which they differ. They attribute but one nature to Christ, and hold that the Spirit proceeds from the Father only. They hold the atonement, baptism, and the Lord's Supper as essentials, but the form of their ordinances differs from ours. They adore the saints but do not believe in purgatory.

E. McArdle, New Haven, Ct. What is the estimated cost of the new Congressional Library, and how many volumes can it accommodate?

It will cost $6,000,000 and is to be completed in 1896. It will be the finest library structure in the world, and will have room for 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 volumes.

M. V. Ferris, Detroit, Mich. 1. From which of Noah's sons are Americans descended? Have we any means of accurately determining the percentage of the different nationalities of Europe?

1. Ethnologists hold that the native races of America are descended from Japheth. The people of Poland, Hungary, Switzerland, France, Spain, Portugal and Britain are believed to be descendants of Gomer, the son of Japheth.

J. B. P., Philadelphia, Pa. What is the Moslem belief concerning the stepping-stone of Mahomet?

The story is not a part of the Mohammedan creed but merely one of the many absurd legends concerning the Prophet. It is said that upon which he used to place his foot in mounting Al Borak, ("The Lightning," his horse. When Mahomet was caught up the stone (so the legend goes) arose with him, and he pushed it back into mid-air, where it hangs suspended but invisible to all save the Moslems with sufficient faith to see it.

Subscriber. 1. Is there any command in the Bible to forgive our enemies before they ask us to do so? Are we to forgive them? 2. Where can I find the remaining verses of the hymn:

Saviour, like a bird, to Thee,
Weary and wounded my soul would flee.

1. There is no specific injunction to do so, although our forgiveness must be freely given at all times. God's attitude toward his children shows that he is ever ready to forgive, and that the moment the sinner turns toward him with contrition, a pardoning hand is extended. See Matt. 18: 21, 22. 2. Perhaps some of our readers may be able to furnish the information.

Mrs. S. W. Allen, Humboldt, Neb. How did Valentine's Day, Shrove Tuesday, and Ash Wednesday originate?

The origin of Valentine's Day and the particular custom associated with it, is unknown. There were several St. Valentines, but which whom the day was designated is uncertain. Shrove Tuesday (the day before Ash Wednesday) was originally so-called from the confession in the Roman Church of confessing sins on that day. Gradually it became a day of merry-making and amusement. Ash Wednesday, the first day of Lent, was originally so-called because penitents formerly appeared on that day in sackcloth and ashes. The extract concerning Easter (mentioned in your letter) is not regard as calling for serious consideration.

A Strange Death.

A remarkable accident has befallen a New York merchant during a visit to Chicago. A press dispatch from the latter city on May 3 says that the merchant had just died there from blood-poisoning. In licking an envelope, the sharp edge of the paper cut his tongue. He thought nothing of it at the time, but the next day he suffered a sharp pain from the laceration and his tongue was swollen. As it grew worse, he went to a doctor about it, and was told that he was suffering from blood-poisoning. The best attention was given to the case, but the poison had permeated the whole body, and it was impossible to save his life. It is strange that so slight a wound should have been fatal, when on the battle-field and in the hospital, men recover after their bodies have received frightful gashes. But it was the poison that killed, although it was a very minute portion that could have entered by that tiny wound in the tongue, it found by that gateway ready access to the stream of life, and so poisoned the whole body. It is so with moral evil. More souls have been lost by the sins we call small, than by great crimes. Lying, and slandering, and profanity, and obscenity, are avenues to destruction as sure as murder and theft, and in those the breach in the spiritual citadel is at the tongue. The words of warning uttered by the apostle James on this subject are confirmed by our experience:

The tongue is a fire : it defileth the whole body and setteth on fire the course of nature : and it is set on fire of hell. (James 3 : 6.

A Pepper Plague in a Church.

A church trouble at Hoboken, N. J., has developed a new agent in ecclesiastical warfare. The congregation of the church is divided on the subject of the pastor's merits and services. The majority have confidence in him and give him their cordial support. A small, but apparently aggressive, party in the church oppose him and want to force him to resign. The usual methods have been adopted without success. While the pastor enjoys the confidence of the larger number of the members he cannot be ousted. His opponents have lately resorted to a campaign of annoyance. The pastor receives abusive letters, criticizing his sermons and his life. He finds objectionable hand bills posted around his residence and once he had to have a member laid under bonds to keep the peace. On a recent Sunday a new method of annoyance was tried. After the opening hymn was sung, an epidemic of sneezing attacked the organist, the congregation and the pastor, which became so violent that the service had to be closed abruptly. The cause was discovered afterward. It was found that red pepper had been put in the organ-pipes and had been scattered through the church by the wind used in the instrument. The trick showed that the pastor's enemies possessed that ingenuity of perversion which is so common in the world. In employing the element which carried delight to the sense of hearing, to carry an irritant to the sense of smell, they only did as the enemy of all good does, when he uses the printing-press and other agencies of good for the dissemination of evil. Material things are neither good nor evil in themselves, but become the one or the other according to the use to which they are put. It is consolatory to know that the time is coming when everything on earth and in nature will become subservient to the mission of the Prince of Peace and will be consecrated to his service.

The creation was subjected to vanity not of its own will, but by reason of him who subjected it . . . and shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God. Romans 8 : 20, 21.

No Man's Land.

A complicated case of jurisdiction has arisen on the borders of Iowa and Nebraska. There is an island there, formed by the Missouri river, which may belong to either State but which neither wants. The original survey of the boundaries of the States was made in 1846 and the Missouri was made the boundary between Iowa and Nebraska. In 1857, when another survey was made, it was found that the river had changed its course and was two miles further west than it was eleven years before. Five hundred acres of land that were formerly on the Nebraska side of the river were thus on the Iowa side. A number of squatters availed themselves of the change to settle on the land and refused to pay taxes. To the Iowa officers they showed that the land had been formerly registered as in Nebraska and to the Nebraska officers they insisted that the river proved the land was in Iowa. They would not pay to either State and they have grown rich by their immunity. Gradually the river again changed its course turning the debatable land into a peninsula. The settlers cut a channel across it and thus by turning it into an island still more completely isolated themselves. But lately a change of mind has occurred. The chance of escaping taxation attracted new settlers and the original settlers are being despoiled of their possessions by violence and they cannot appeal to either State for protection. Already one murder has been committed and there have been many violent quarrels. The original settlers now wish that one of the States would assume control of the island and they realize that they blundered when they repudiated allegiance. There are many people who make a similar discovery at the end of their lives as to their souls. Even those need God's help then who in their days of health and prosperity would not listen to his invitations and were deaf to his warnings.

They would none of my counsel and despised all my reproof : . . . therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way, etc. (Prov. 1: 30, 31.

BRIEF NOTES.

Church Members Seeking Employment, or who wish to add to their incomes, may find it to their interest to send their address to Box J, Station D, New York.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has been Holding Union Services at Bryn Mawr, Pa. Five churches co-operated in the work. The meetings were largely attended and at the close fully three hundred persons made profession of faith.

There are 75,000 Jews in Persia, and it is stated that they are openly listening to the Gospel, one of their rabbis allowing Rev. Dr. Bruce to preach in his synagogue.

Rev. George C. Needham and Dr. W. J. Erdman are conducting a Second Advent campaign in England. Fifteen cities and towns have been visited since the beginning of March, and meetings of two or three days' duration held in each.

Dr. Talmage's Service at the Academy of Music, New York, on May 12 was the occasion of a scene that will never be forgotten by any who witnessed it. The sermon, which was published in this journal last week, was addressed especially to young men. After its delivery hundreds of them, many of whom showed traces of strong emotion in their faces, crowded around the preacher to shake his hand and thank him for his eloquent words.

The Summer Schools of the American Institute of Sacred Literature will be held at Winfield, Kan., June 18-29; Chautauqua, N. Y., July 6 to Aug. 16; and at Bay View, Mich., July 18 to Aug. 15. Other appointments are being made, a list of which may be obtained from the Secretary, Prof. Geo. S. Burroughs, Ph. D., Hyde Park, Chicago.

A Wonderful Meeting was held at Millville, N. J., on May 9th in connection with the series of services conducted by Rev. Thomas Harrison. It was Jubilee Day at the Revival, to celebrate the conversion of the seven hundred persons who have made profession of faith during the services. Dr. Talmage preached in the afternoon to a congregation that filled the First Methodist Episcopal Church in every part and at the conclusion of the service, finding that an enormous crowd had been unable to enter the church, Dr. Talmage preached again from the church steps to fully three thousand persons.

A Call for a National Conference on Political Reform has been issued by a number of prominent clergymen and Christian workers. The conference will be held June 28 to July 4, in the University Temple, Prohibition Park, Staten Island. Among the subjects set down for discussion are: Prohibition; Government Ownership of Railroads, Telegraphs and Telephones; Woman Suffrage; Proportional Representation; Monopolies and Trusts; and the National Currency. Among the signers of the call are Dr. W. S. Rainsford; Dr. Josiah Strong; Dr. I. K. Funk; Hon. John G. Wooley; Mary T. Burt and Frances E. Willard.

Rev. Hermann Warszawiak's work among the Jews of New York is now organized as "The American Mission to the Jews," under the direction of a committee of clergymen and gentlemen. Dr. John Hall is chairman and among the members are Dr. Henry A. Stimson, Dr. David J. Burrell, Dr. Samuel H. Virgin, Dr. F. F. Ellinwood, Mr. A. W. Dennett and Mr. Samuel B. Schieffelein. Arrangements are being made for Mr. Warszawiak to hold services for the Jews of New York in the Church of Sea and Land in Market Street.

A Descendant of Mahomed was Recently baptised in Persia, and gave up his honorable green turban, saying that he no longer gloried in having the Oriental prophet for his father.

An Eccentric Farmer who Died Near Forgue, Scotland, about a year ago, gave his family Bible to his old housekeeper before his death. She expected a legacy, but was disappointed, as no will could be found. On opening the Bible after several months, she has found the will between the leaves. It makes her soul heiress of the deceased.

At the Convention of the Open Air Workers' Association of America, held in Washington, D. C., May 6 and 7, Dr. Teunis S. Hamlin was elected President. An illustrated report of the work of the Association for the year has been issued. It may be obtained from the Secretary, 77 State street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Have Received a unanimous invitation from the ministers of the Evangelical Churches of Atlanta, Ga., to hold a series of services in that city during the time of the Southern Exposition, which is to be held in that city, commencing October next. A large tabernacle is to be erected for the services.

Prepararations are Being Made for a Pan-American Congress of Religion and Education, which is to be held at Toronto July 18-25. It is arranged that there shall be six Sections, respectively with : Publication, Education, Philanthropy, Temperance and Rescue Work, the Denominations, and Young People's Societies. Among the speakers are to be Bishops Vincent and Hurst, Dr Gunsalus, President W. R. Harper, and Dr. H. W. Bennett. All particulars may be obtained by addressing the Secretary, Mr. S. Sherin, Toronto, Can.

The Deplorable Accident at one of the Sunday services in Messrs. Moody and Sankey's tent in Fort Worth, Tex., has proved to be less disastrous than was at first reported. [illegible] was a sudden down-pour of rain in extraordinary volume. No [illegible] carrying off the water from the roof of the temporary building in which the services were held, the weight of water caused about one-third of the ceiling to fall in. A number were injured, but none of them seriously, and we understand that all are happily recovering.

SERMONS-WORTH READING

HELPFUL DISCOURSES for the PEOPLE

THE ENLISTED HEART.

Preached in the Hanson Place M.E.Church, Brooklyn, by Dr. Louis Albert Banks.

Text: Isa. 44: 20, "He feedeth on ashes: a deceived heart hath turned him aside."

THE heart and not the head is the central throne of human life. Many a clear head has gone to its ruin through the power of a bad heart; and many a weak head has worn the crown of glory through the benediction of a good heart. It is desirable to have a good head and a good heart, but the heart is of the most importance. The Bible sets this forth in many striking sentences. Solomon says, "My son, give me thine heart," intimating if that was given, all was given; and again it is declared, "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he;" and again, "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." And Jesus, in the twelfth chapter of Matthew, declares that "a good man, out of the good treasure of his heart, bringeth forth good things: and an evil man, out of the evil treasure, bringeth forth evil things."

Anselm says that our heart is like a mill which a certain man gave in charge to his servant, commanding that he should only grind in it his master's grain—whether wheat, barley or oats—and telling him that he must subsist on the produce of the mill. But that servant had an enemy who was always alert to do him harm. If at any time he found the mill unwatched, he threw in gravel to keep the stones from acting, or pitch to clog them, or dirt and chaff to mix with the meal. If the servant was faithful in watching the mill, there came forth the beautiful flour which was at once a service to his master and a subsistence to himself; but if he played truant, and allowed his enemy to tamper with his machinery, his employer was angry and he himself was starved. Our hearts are like that mill. They are ever grinding on the thoughts and imaginations with which we feed them. The devil is a vigilant enemy: he throws in evil thoughts which can only be prevented by watchfulness and prayer.

A Dying Boy's Message.

There can be no doubt that our text and the Scriptures generally teach us that the heart dictates whether we are good or bad. Let us see into a man's heart, and we will know what kind of a man he is. The widow of General Custer tells a touching story of President Lincoln. It was during the war of the Rebellion, when General McClellan had sent for President Lincoln and Secretary Stanton to visit and consult with him on the battle-field. It was at night, and the dead and wounded were being carried from the field. The lanterns of the men who moved among the slain shone out like fire-flies as they passed. As one stretcher came near Mr. Lincoln, he heard the voice of a lad calling to his mother. He forgot the crisis of the hour. His very being concentrated itself in the crisis of the dying boy. Stopping the carriers, he knelt and, bending over him, asked, "What can I do for you, my poor child?" "Oh, you will do nothing for me," he replied. "You are a Yankee. I cannot hope that my message to my mother will ever reach her." Mr. Lincoln's tears, his voice full of tenderest love, convinced the boy of his sincerity, and he gave the good-bye words without [illegible] and ordered that they be sent that night with a flag of truce into the enemy's lines. He only told the soldier who he was to assure [illegible]; and when told that time was precious, he went away from the boy's side with sobs and tears. Surely nothing could speak so eloquently of the qualities of that great man as this window into his heart.

We often say of a compliment or a gift that we value it highly because it comes from the heart. This is often our unconscious testimony to the supreme importance of the heart. A pretty story relating to Uhland, the German lyric poet, was current a few years since in the literary world. Uhland was as modest as he was learned, and when the King of Prussia offered him a most coveted Order, he declined to accept it. While the poet was explaining to his wife the reason which moved him to refuse the distinction, there was a knock at the door. A peasant girl from the neighborhood entered and, presenting Uhland with a bunch of violets, said, "This is an offering from my mother." "Your mother, child!" replied the poet; "I thought she died last autumn." "That is true, Herr Uhland," said the girl; "and I begged you at the time to make a little verse for her grave, and you kindly sent me a beautiful poem. These are the first violets which have bloomed on mother's grave. I have plucked them, and I like to think she sends them to you with her greetings." The poet's eyes moistened as he took the flowers, and, putting them in his button-hole, he said to his wife: "There, dear woman, is not that an Order more valuable than any king can give?"

A Mutilated Face.

The heart puts its own stamp upon the man or woman in whose bosom it beats. The heart gives dignity or brands with shame. You cannot properly judge any man except his heart is permitted to explain his life. About the streets of one of our eastern cities there is a man who carries a grievously mutilated face. His poor face is marred worse than almost any you could find, and it is almost impossible to look at it with the eye of a stranger, without a certain sense of revulsion, though your tenderness of heart may mingle it with pity. He is a business man, but he always wears a military cap. The cap is significant, and the intelligent observer reads it at a glance, and sees in the cap the explanation of the face. The cap says this: At the breaking out of the War of the Rebellion this young man had a splendid, strong face with regular features that were the delight of his mother's heart and the pleasure and comfort of his friends. When Fort Sumter was fired on, he went to the front in defense of his country's flag. His countenance was shot in pieces because he dared to stand up where the air was thick and dreadful with flying lead aimed at the heart of his country. This man is greatly held in honor by his fellow-citizens, because they hold their country at the price of all the symmetry that was in his features when he bore them bravely to the front against the foe, for this cruel scarring. And to every true soul his ruined face has a beauty of its own, fairer than any mere moulding in human flesh could give. Rest assured, my brother, that your heart will put its brand on you for good or evil.

The heart gives power and influence after its kind. It is related of a famous French woman who once reigned in Paris society, that she was so homely when a girl that her mother said to her one day, "My poor child, you are too ugly for any one ever to fall in love with you." It sank down deep into the little girl's heart, and instead of making her sour and bitter, it had just the opposite effect. From this time she began to be very kind to the poor children of the village, the servants of the household, and even the birds that hopped about the garden walks. She so gave herself up to this spirit of kindness and service for others that she was distressed to be compelled to part from anyone without having rendered them some service. This good-will towards everybody, and her constant desire to do good, at last made her the idol of Paris, where she lived as Madame de Circourt. Though her complexion was sallow, and her gray eyes small and sunken, yet she held in devotion to her the greatest men and noblest women of her time. Her unfailing interest in others made her, it is said, perfectly irresistible. Such a life furnishes a most valuable lesson to all who would be attractive, that they may be useful; for, other things being equal, it is the most interesting, the most winning, man or woman who does the most good.

The precious thing about all this is that this grace of heart—this gentle, generous, loving, overflowing interest in others, which is so fascinating, and this fragrance of a sympathetic and kindly nature, which is always so attractive, is of us. Perhaps someone now here who has given way to harshness of speech and temper, and selfishness of conduct, until it seems to be first nature to him, will say that is exaggerated; but it is not. Just as surely as the south winds and the long days of sunshine can melt the snow and ice and thaw out the frozen ponds, and fill gardens and orchards and pastures and fields and forests with verdure and flowers and songs of gladness and joy, so the coming of our cold hearts under the steady beams of the Sun of Righteousness, the bringing our lives into tender, sympathetic fellowship with Christ, can change our nature into a kindly and gracious climate that shall testify to the atmosphere of heaven that has pervaded and transformed it.

If a man's heart is enlisted, he can, by the help of God, deny every faculty and appetite which tempts him to evil. "Doctor," said a lady at a fashionable dinner-party a few years ago, to the present Bishop Henry C. Potter, of New York City, "I observe that you take no wine." "No," said Dr. Potter, "I have not done so for many years—in fact, for twenty-five years." She expressed surprise in the look which met the doctor's answer. "It may interest you to know why I abstain," said Dr. Potter, observing the expression of his companion. "I will tell you. A man with an unconquerable passion for drink came frequently to see me, and told me how this miserable passion was bringing him to utter ruin; how his employers, every time he obtained a situation, were compelled to dismiss him, because of his terrible habit. One day I said to this man, 'Why will you not say, here and now, before God, and in his help, I will never taste liquor again?' The man said, 'Doctor, if you were in my place you would not say that.' I answered, 'Temperate man that I am, I will say so this moment'—and I spoke the solemn vow that I had called upon him to make. My poor friend looked at me with consternation. Then an expression of hope overspread his face. With steady, voice he pronounced the vow. A moment after he left me, but returned often to see me. The vow has been kept; and he that was fast losing soul and body, found a position, kept it, and became not only a sober, but a godly man." Dr. Potter was able to do that because his heart was in it. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he."

I stand here with all assurance to plead with you to forsake your sins and enter upon a new life of righteousness, because I know that if you will give your heart to Christ, and let him enter in and possess that fortress, you will be more than a match for every temptation which besets you. "Your heart shall live forever"—the world shall pass away, and all its glory shall fade as the leaf; but the heart lives. In Lucoardi's studio in Rome are representing the seasons. Spring is a delicate girl, with rosebuds at her breast, flowers in her smooth, silky hair; and a wistful look of the future. Summer is a woman with full lips, face, and figure, flushed with vigorous, lusty life, headed wheat in her hair, and a satisfied look of the present. Autumn is the same face later, crowned with clustered grapes, wearing a look of pensive retrospect, half-mournful satiety, and disenchantment—a sober afternoon look of reality and seeing things as they are. Winter, with rigid, shrunken face, and blown hair, wears pine cones on her thin locks, and her rheumy, uncertain eyes seem to face a driving storm. This last bust is as effective, artistically, as the others, but too grim and stern to be pleasant.

The marbles speak not more clearly of earth's seasons than they do of the rapid procession of the periods of our human life. OUR BOOK SHELF.

THE OLD TESTAMENT.*

THE Hebrew Scriptures were written with iron pens, with ink made of lampblack dissolved in gall-juice, and on skins of animals. The skins were cut in strips, which were joined end to end and rolled from opposite extremities on two sticks, making a scroll. Rolls of the ancient pattern may be seen in modern Jewish synagogues. The skins, of course, were highly durable, but in the use of centuries the original manuscripts of all the Scripture books have disappeared. The manuscript from which our English Bible is rendered seems to have been worn or torn, at the end of the second book of Chronicles, right in the middle of a sentence, where there should have been a pause at all, not even enough to be punctuated with a comma. The first part of the sentence is repeated, and the conclusion added, in the third verse of the first chapter of the Book of Ezra: in fact, Ezra begins with the twenty-second verse of the last chapter of II. Chronicles.

The books of the New Testament were doubtless written originally on papyrus—a common writing-material of that time—composed of the fibre of the papyrus plant, with some glutinous substance, subjected to pressure. There are versions of the Old Testament which antedate all manuscripts in existence—the Septuagint, the Chaldee and Samaritan Targums, the Syriac Peshitto, and the Vulgate. The three oldest manuscripts in existence are known as the Vatican, Sinai, and Alexandrian MSS. These Bibles are written in Greek, with only uncial, which are capital, letters. The other uncial manuscripts there are, if we include fragments, fifty-six of the Gospels, fourteen of the Acts, six of the Catholic Epistles, fifteen of the Pauline Epistles, and five of the Apocalypse. Of the cursive manuscripts—cursive means "running hand," in which letters were joined as we join them now, written not in capitals, but small letters—there are about two thousand of the books and various parts of the New Testament. The uncial letters show a more ancient custom of writing than the cursive.

The Vatican and Sinai Bibles are supposed by scholars to have been written in the fourth century, the Alexandrian in the fifth. The Vatican seems to be the oldest of the three. The Sinai Bible was found by Constantine Tischendorf in a convent at the foot of Mount Sinai: a few leaves in 1844; nothing in 1853, when he returned to find that the monks had hidden them from him; and the entire book as it now is in 1859, when he returned armed with a letter from the Czar of Russia, the head of the Greek Church. It is now in St. Petersburg. It contains twenty-two books of the Old Testament, the New Testament, the "Epistle of Barnabas," and part of the "Shepherd of Hermas." The Alexandrian Bible was brought by Cyril Lucar, Patriarch of Constantinople, from Alexandria in Egypt, and by him presented to Charles I. of England, who kept it in his private library. In 1753 is was taken to the British Museum, in London, where it remains.

Manuscripts were few in number, and exposed to a thousand and one mischances, from ignorance, carelessness, controversies, political dissensions, fire, earthquake, confusions incident upon epidemics, war, captivity, the destruction of cities and kingdoms. During the reign of Josiah in Judah, six or seven centuries after Moses, "a book of the law of the Lord by Moses" was found by Hilkiah the priest. Whatever that book was it was clearly lost, or unknown, at least for some considerable period before that time. In another instance King Jehoiakim seizes a manuscript of Jeremiah's prophecy, cuts it in strips with a penknife, and burns it in the fire.

The titles of many books were not given by the writers. It is not known that any of them were. With Jews and Christians the titles have been different. The Jews frequently called books by the first word or two in them. So it was in the Pentateuch: Genesis was called B'reshith, "In the beginning;" Exodus was Y'ellah Sh'moth, "Now these are the names:" Leviticus was Vayyikra, "And he called." They called the Book of Psalms Th'hillim, which means, literally, praise-songs, or, liberally, praise-book or hymnal. The titles to many of the single psalms were given by editors or compilers. Jerome gave the Books of Chronicles their present name. The Jews called them "Events of the Times:" the Septuagint names them "Paraleipomena," which means "things left over," or supplements.

PROPHECY AS A GUIDE.

BY REV. RICHARD CHESTER.

INASMUCH as a large portion of the Holy Scriptures is essentially prophetic—and all Scripture is affirmed to be "given by inspiration of God," and to be "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness"—to speak of the importance of the study of prophecy, might appear to be little else than waste of precious time. Do not all, it may be asked, who believe the Bible to be the Word of God, fully assent to the importance of the study of prophecy? The answer is, By no means. Theoretically they may assent to it. They cannot well do otherwise: but practically many of the readers and students of God's Word deny it—not taking any interest in it themselves, as though it were unimportant.

Nor is it very difficult to account for this. It would seem to be a tradition handed down from our fathers, and accepted and acted upon by numbers amongst us, without ever questioning its correctness, that the real practical use of prophecy is only as an evidence of, and a witness to, the foreknowledge and the truthfulness of God; which it can only be when fulfilment has turned it into history; and that, therefore, while it is still, properly speaking, prophecy—the foretelling of still future events—there is no real, tangible, practical object to be attained by making ourselves familiar with it. That such is the opinion of not a few of the clergy themselves, and of some men of special learning and eminence among them, is a fact of which most of you are fully aware and perhaps sincerely deplore.

For my part I can only account for this fact by regarding it as a mournful instance of how far the strength of prejudice, and the consequent unwillingness to consider any subject which would tend to weaken or to remove it, will go towards blinding the minds of those who, in other respects, are remarkably keen-witted and far-seeing.

There were, we know, those of old who did neglect it—who studied only such portions of the Word of God as seemed to fall in with their own views and opinions—who neglected the predictions of the Messiah's first coming in humiliation to suffer; familiarizing themselves only with the predictions of his second coming in glory, to reign. And the result, as we all know, was that when he did come as their suffering Messiah—born, as was foretold, by a virgin—born of the family of which, and in the place in which, it had been foretold that the Messiah should be born—acting as it was foretold that he should act—suffering as it was foretold that he should suffer—dying and rising again as the prophets had predicted that their Messiah should die and should arise—they saw not the connection between such prophecies and their exact and most literal fulfilment—they themselves unwittingly "fulfilled them in condemning him." And the apostle's charge against them was "through ignorance ye did it." "If they had known," another apostle affirms, "they would not have crucified the Lord of glory." But the ignorance was wilful ignorance, and therefore culpable in the very highest degree.

We can now see the magnitude of their crime, and measure it by the severity and the duration of its punishment. Is it not passing strange that any one with the past history and present position of the Jewish people before his eyes, can for one moment imagine it to be either wise or right, or safe to neglect, and to remain therefore in wilful contented ignorance of God's unfulfilled prophetic word!

To be Concluded.

CHRIST-LIKE LIVING.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing June 2. Galatians 2: 19, 20; 5: 22-25.

NO more disastrous mistake can be made than to treat the religion of Christ as a system of doctrines, a creed to be believed, a scheme of substitution to escape punishment. If a man's heart and life are bad, he is not a Christian, although his orthodoxy may be immaculate, his creed sound, and his baptism, confirmation, or church-membership in good order. Neither intellectual belief, nor outward ceremony of any kind can make a man a Christian. The teaching of Christ was emphatic on this point, and Paul, John, and James reiterated it in their subsequent utterances. If assent to a doctrine, or a rite, such as baptism or the partaking of the Lord's Supper, could make a man a member of Christ's kingdom, the work of evangelizing the world would be an easy matter. The change a man undergoes in becoming a real Christian is so radical, that Christ described it as a new birth, the beginning of a new life; and Paul compares it to the change of one who has died and been raised from the dead. The stress that is often laid in these days on the two simple ordinances of Christianity finds no support in the New Testament. If there were any saving power in baptism, Paul would not have been thankful that he had baptized so few, but he would have wished that he had baptized more; and he distinctly mentions some who were worse instead of better for partaking of the Lord's Supper. No better service could be rendered to some self-satisfied people in the outward and visible church to-day, than to convince them of the nature of the indispensable condition of admission to Christ's kingdom, "Ye must be born again." The Christ-like life is the only satisfactory evidence any man can give to his own conscience and to the judgment of his fellowmen that he is really a Christian. The words of the Apostle to the Galatians, on which the Topic is based, are proof that he held that opinion. They were a stroug, impulsive people in whom the vices of the time were active, and they were assailed by powerful temptations from their own natures and from their surroundings. The Apostle evidently liked them and sympathized with them, but he does not lower the standard to make the path easier for them. He enumerates the fruits of the flesh and the fruits of the spirit, and leaves them to judge which life they are living. If their lives bring forth the fruits of the flesh, there can be no doubt as to their nature.

The same test operates to this day. It is open to every man to live the life of a man or of a brute. He may gratify his body, and find his happiness in eating, drinking, and the pleasures of the senses, or he may devote himself to the higher life, and have no joy so great as in the attainment of spiritual elevation. The latter will involve trial and difficulty and continuous effort. It might be impossible, were it not for the power which Paul describes to the Galatians, as he described to all the other peoples to whom he preached. In the power of Christ's resurrection lay the hope for them, as it lies for us. The old life is ended, the old power of the flesh is broken, when a man becomes identified with Christ in his death on the cross. Through that death deliverance is wrought. As by the battles of the Civil War, the slave was emancipated and could go free if he would, so by the death of Christ freedom from the dominion of the flesh is placed within the reach of every man. He may cease to be a slave to his appetites and passions; cease to be a mere animal, and become a true man, a son of God. And more than that is achieved. Christ not only won emancipation for men by his death, but gives power by his resurrection. He lives, and lives to help all who would profit by his death. Paul declared that his life in the flesh was sustained by that power. He still wore the old body, but the man in it was the new man whose vitality came from the living Christ. So it is with every man who is living the Christ life.

A CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR CHURCH.

The purposes to which the young people's society can be adapted appear to have no limit. It seems capable of operating in any field whether it is the original Society, or its younger sisters of the Methodist and Baptist fold. "The Kansas Endeavorer" tells the story of an ingenious effort to rescue a church from extinction through the agency of the Christian Endeavor Society. The Church of which a picture is here given, was built in 1888 at North Wichita, Kans. A pastor was ordained and settled there. For a time all went well and there were over a hundred members in good standing. But by the end of 1892 a change in the business interests of the neighborhood had proved disastrous to the church. Various attempts were made to keep up the interest, but the attendance declined and the debts increased. In April of last year a new minister came to it as a "stated supply." He was an enthusiastic believer in Christian Endeavor and he proposed to rescue the Church on that line. The debt was the chief obstacle. A share for every dollar of indebtedness was drawn up and the whole number were issued for sale to the Christian Endeavor Societies of the Presbyterian Church. The "Endeavorer" states that when its article was written more than one-half the shares had been sold and there was a good prospect of disposing of the remainder. When the whole are sold the church will be the property of the Christian Endeavor Societies and it is proposed to re-name it The Christian Endeavor Church. In the meantime new life was imparted to Church work and some of the features of an Institutional Church were added to its usefulness. A Library, Reading room and other departments were organized and an effort made to render the church such an one as the Christian Endeavor Societies might be proud to own.

THE Y. M. C. A. CONVENTION.

The following statistics were given in the report of the International Committee at the recent Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations at Springfield, Mass.: The numbers of Associations reporting show a membership of 244,077 as against 245,809 in '93; with an active membership of 116,761 as against 114,088 in '93. The value of the Association buildings and real estate, deducting debt, is $13,439,555, as against $11,316,180 in '93. The report showed the effect of the prevailing financial depression in the abridgement of resources and activity in some of the associations. But it is encouraging to note advancement in educational, railroad, college, colored and Indian work. The last two years are reported as being the best spiritual years the association has ever enjoyed. The expenses of the committee have been cut down by force of the financial depression from $75,000 in '93 to $63,000 in '94, and the budget for 1895 is made up on the same economical basis as that of 1803. Between 1890 and 1895 the International Committee has put 911 secretaries into the field. Between 1870 and 1880, twenty-seven buildings were erected; in the next decade 178 buildings; now there are 305 buildings. For the last five years a new building has been dedicated every two weeks. There are now over 100 places fitted up for the use of railroad men. In the south alone are nineteen places calling for railroad Associations, and we cannot give them what they want for the lack of funds in the hands of the International Committee. Every town in New York of over 25,000 inhabitants now has an Association owning its own building.

Mr. Hunton, the colored Secretary of the Committee, said the work among colored men was being pushed on two lines, among college students and among young men of cities and towns. There are 33 college Associations with 1723 members. Seven new Associations have been formed during the past year. The members are learning ways and methods. In nearly all the Associations conversions have been reported, and in some, blessed revivals have sprung from the students' Gospel meetings.

David McConaughy, Jr., of Madras, International Secretary for India, just returned from his first five years' work in India gave a thrilling account of the beginning and growth of the work during that period. There were eighteen Associations, some dead or dying, and none with a native membership, when he landed in 1890. Now there are eighty Associations with a membership 4,000, more than four times that in 1890. Now there are five general secretaries and five natives in training as assistant secretaries. Bible classes, open-air meetings and Gospel meetings are conducted by these Associations. On one line of railroad where one young Christian Scotchman has labored, so many of the railroad men have been converted, that the native dance houses that used to thrive on the patronage of the men, have been closed.

From An Anxious Friend for the conversion of a man who has lived forty years without God and for whom only one person is praying.

From A Wife and Mother, Wilson Creek, N. Y., for the conversion of husband and son.

Their Homes were Palaces.

The People of Nineveh and their Magnificence — A Vanished City whose Wickedness was the Cause of its Ruin.

BENEATH gigantic "tells" or mounds of debris, on the Eastern bank of the river Tigris, and opposite the modern city of Mosul, lies all that remains of the once mighty and populous city of Nineveh, "mistress of the world" for many centuries before the Christian age. It was one of a group of cities and royal residences on the banks of that famous river, which included Assur, Korsabad, Nimrud and Calah. In its beginnings, like those of many other old-world cities, are all but lost in the darkness of the ages. It is stated in Gen. 10: 11, that Asshur after leaving Shinar, went forth and builded Nineveh," and another passage indicates Nimrod, the "mighty hunter," as the builder. To the Jews, Assyria was known as the "land of Nimrod," (Micah 5: 6), whose first population came from the still more ancient Babylon. Although the kingdom of Assyria is frequently mentioned in the Bible, in connection with Hebrew history, Nineveh, after the reference made in Genesis to its foundation, is only again referred to till 800 B.C., when it is mentioned in the book of Jonah, as the capital of a kingdom and the scene of great wickedness. Its divine condemation was followed by its destruction by the Medes in 606 B.C., a fate in which the surrounding royal cities were also involved. After a long siege, the Assyrians and their Babylonian allies, favored by a sudden overflow of the Tigris, which carried away part of the walls, allowed the enemy to enter. Saracus, the Assyrian king, burned himself in his palace; the inundation gave the people of the city over to the flames, and the sacrifice of human life and destruction of splendid palaces, temples and continued like the royal city a smoking ruin, and all the people were either slain or sent into captivity. Nineveh never rose again, and the fulfilment of prophecy was complete.

HIGH PRIEST AND KING.

NOBLEMAN AND COURTIERS.

TYPES OF THE PEOPLE OF ANCIENT ASSYRIA, IN CORRECT COSTUME.

Of nearly all, that the world knows of the history of this effaced city, has been derived from the monumental records that have been exhumed from the ruins. Ancient historians picture it as a vast and populous capital, magnificent beyond all other cities. From the Hebrew prophets it is learned that the city was of such extent that its circuit was "a three days' journey," and its homes were 120,000 children. It had the most beautiful parks, gardens, artificial lakes and groves, and its palaces were richer in sculpture and ornamentation than any in the East. Its people, too, were wealthy and cultured, and fond of war and conquest. 1500 fortresses of great strength protected its walls. Its princes and nobles were numerous and powerful, and the love of extravagance and costly display was universal. Diodorus Siculus wrote that the city was twenty-one miles in length and fifty-four miles in circumference and that the walls were 100 feet in height and broad enough for three chariots to drive abreast.

Some faint idea of the glory of Nineveh may be gathered from the accompanying illustration, taken from a drawing prepared by Layard, the celebrated Orientalist, who, after years of excavation in the debris, was thus enabled to present a view of the city, as it might be reconstructed from the ruins. Central in the illustration is the beautiful palace of the Assyrian kings, upon the repairing of which Sennacherib is said to have employed 360,000 captives from Chaldea, Armenia and elsewhere. Under this warlike monarch the city doubtless attained its greatest splendor. Its citizens were nobly apparelled and there was such an abundance of wealth within its walls that few were poor. The smaller illustrations on this page are important owing to their historical accuracy, especially in point of costume, the figures being carefully reproduced from sculptures and paintings found among the ruins of Nineveh. Enameled brick, wood, stone, marble and alabaster were used in the construction of the buildings. No sculptures representing private life in Nineveh have been discovered, although personal and domestic ornaments, libraries of engraved brick cylinders, inscribed tablets, ruins of temples, altars, sculptured lions and bulls, colossal gods and goddesses, and drawings of beautiful chairs and couches and musical instruments were all found in the excavations by Layard, George Smith of the British Museum, M. Botta and others. But the most precious "find" was a tablet containg a portion of the Chaldaic account of the Deluge, strangely confirmatory of the Bible. Other inscriptions, confirmatory of different events recorded in Bible history were also unearthed from the mounds where they had lain hidden 2500 years.

That the "mistress of witchcraft," as the prophet Nahum called Nineveh, was the wickedest city of its time, is unquestioned. Idolatries, sorceries and vices of every description prevailed. Kings and heroes were deified and worshipped, the knowledge of the true God was confounded and obscured and the idea of a future existence was confined to dim traditions, borrowed from the Chaldeans, of "a land in the silver sky."

Memories of Home.

"I remember before I came to America the first time," writes Lady Henry Somerset, "I went among the iron workers of South Wales, and as I bade them goodby, they said, 'Be sure to go to Pittsburg and see the Welshmen there,' and they gave me so many messages the great Atlantic liner would not have carried all. But when I got to America I went to Pittsburg and talked with the Welshmen in the iron works there, and they gave me a basket of flowers, and in the centre was a beautiful daffodil. I knew they were far from their native land, and as I looked upon the daffodil I said, 'Does not that remind you of home and the springtime and the green hills of your own beautiful Wales?' And down the cheeks of those hard-working men coursed the tears. What was it? Nothing but a little yellow flower, and the word 'home.'"

A MOTHER'S HANDS.

THESE pale and wrinkled hands,
Which once were soft and fair,
Have lost the grace of former years
Through weary pain and care.

But yet these hands to me,
With beauty rare still shine,
In that sweet, hallowed inward light,
Akin to things divine.

Some day—'twill not be long,
These hands so marred by pain,
To outward form of loveliness
Will sure return again.

When in triumphant joy
And perfect strength again,
They'll minister to Christ the Lord
With all the heavenly train.

Mother's Influence.

Mothers cannot overestimate the power for good or evil which they exert over their children. And to fail to diligently and solicitously exert all that commanding and moulding influence over them for their good is the gravest of mistakes—is even a terrible crime. Walter Savage Landor says:

Children are what their mothers are,
No fondest father's fondest care
Can fashion so the infant's heart
As those creative beams that dart,
With all their hopes and fears, upon
The cradle of a sleeping son.
His startled eyes with wonder see
A father near him on his knee,
Who wishes all the while to trace
The mother in his future face;
But 'tis to her alone uprise
His waking arms; to her those eyes
Open with joy and not surprise.

Family Censors.

Nearly every family has a censor, or critic, among its own members, whose business it is to prick the bubble of self-esteem just before it gets big enough to burst, and it is also his business to establish standards of virtue for every one to struggle to live up to. It is a cruel condition of affairs when the mother is the family censor. Perhaps there are a lot of children who romp and disturb you, and make raids on the preserves, and bring in mud, and tear their clothing, and get bumped and bruised, and wear out your nervous system, and then you scold. Don't do it. Perhaps they come running in from their play to tell you a beautiful story—then is your test. The little faces you love are soiled, and a great hole in the knee of a stocking stares you out of countenance. If you can respond to their smiles, and the beautiful light shining in their eyes, and never see the blemishes, then you are not the family censor. Sometimes the father is the family censor. This is another bad condition. The influence of censoriousness shuts the sunshine out of life. It stamps the frown of disapproval on the forehead. It mars the character, and stirs up the nature of others to season them with bitterness.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER XX.

The Tables Turned.

OPINION in the court room was evidently changed after Mrs. Callaghan's testimony. The case which seemed so clear and simple at the beginning was taking a new turn. An id a was abroad that the defendant was no criminal but rather a victim. The idea soon gained ground.

Mr. Jacobs' son was the next witness.

"Did you receive a bracelet from a young lady as a pledge?" asked the lawyer.

"Yes, sir.'

"Is this th one?" (showing the bracelet).

"Yes, dot vas it."

"Would you know the person again from whom you received it, if you saw her?"

"Yes, sir, I vould know her in a minute."

At this reply Mr. Jackson started as if stung by a wasp, and unconsciously arose to his feet and leaned forward, holding on to the back of the seat in front of him. Nettie tried to hide herself by shrinking behind Mrs. Wilson, so that all that could be seen of her was a pair of wild eyes that stared with a frightened gaze upon the witness from ver that lady's shoulder.

"Was it the prisoner whom, you see before you, who pawned the bracelet?"

"Oh, n ."

"Have you seen the person who did pawn the bracelet since she left it with you?"

"Yes, sir."

"Where?"

"Here in dis court room."

"Will you point her out to me?"

Again there was a death-like stillness, and very eye was fixed upon the witness as h turned and pointed to Nettie. This created a great sensation. Every eye followed in the directi n of his finger, and some might have thought it was Mrs. Wilson or Alfreda to whom he pointed, had not poor Nettie, with a cry between a sob and a scream, dropped upon her knees before Mrs. Wilson, and in a hysterical voice and manner began t plead:

"Oh! madam, save me! It was not my fault. Mr. Jackson made me do it. He said it was n t st aling; that he would see that you got it again. He said that he would keep his promise, and save my honor, if I did it."

"Will some one remove this person?" said Mrs. Wilson, as she arose to her feet. Alfreda had already taken a step or two on her way to the door, when she turned and said:

"Mother, will you come?" I shall not remain another minute."

Poor Nettie; her mind had been racked with doubts and fears ever since she took the bracelet. Jackson had never fully succeeded in convincing her that it was an innocent transaction, and now that she knew his motive and the consequences of what she had done, the crash was too much for her tortured brain and heart, and she sank to the floor unconscious, and lay as if dead. Louie was the first to act; and in a moment was on her knees by Nettie's side, and Alice, forgetting that she was a prisoner, found herself helping Louie to raise the fallen girl, when Mrs. Callaghan picked her up as if she had been a baby.

"Sure ye were not as much to blame for falling, as the murdering villain who pushed ye down, bad luck to him," said the good woman, as folded in her strong motherly arms she carried the unconscious girl into one of the waiting rooms.

During the commotion caused by this incident, Mrs. Wilson and Alfreda had hurriedly left the court. Louie, by want of thought on their part, or design on hers, had been left behind.

Mr. Jackson and his brother hastily passed through the court and left by the rear door. But they were met at the head of the stairs by Graham and a policeman.

"Gentleman," said Graham, "you will please return to the court room."

"Who are you, sir, and pray why should we return?"

"Well, it matters little who I am, but you see what I am," said Graham, as he unbuttoned his coat and exhibited his star.

Jackson changed color and his brother tried to slip away, but the policeman laid his hand upon his shoulder and said:

"Don't be in a hurry, sir, you'll please wait for the other gentleman."

"I see," said Jackson, trying to put on a bold front, "yet fail to see by what right you stop this gentleman or myself. I have nothing to do with the trial now going on."

"Will you please inform us at once what your business is, for I am in a hurry?" said the brother.

"Gentlemen, you are both under arrest, and you will please return quietly to the hall, if you wish to avoid a scene."

"On what charge, may I ask? I only ask so as to save you from committing a great blunder, for whatever the charge, you are certainly mistaken in the persons," said Mr. Jackson.

"I will explain it all in a minute when we get inside," and he took him by the arm and led him back, while the policeman acted as escort to his brother.

"Alice Mapleton," said the Judge, "you are discharged. I congratulate you on the triumphant vindication of your character. Lest in the future you should be subjected to any injury or annoyance as a result of this prosecution, I state here emphatically, and I shall see that it is made a matter of record, that you have conclusively proved your entire innocence of the charge, and it has also been proved that you have been the victim of a conspiracy of a most malicious character, which ought to be investigated with the view of bringing the guilty parties to justice."

The case was no sooner settled than Mr. Graham brought Mr. Jackson and his brother before the bar.

"I have a charge to bring against these men," said the detective. "I charge John Jackson, the prisoner, with grand larceny, in stealing and secreting $25,000 in diamonds and jewelry, the property of Mrs. and Miss Mapleton. And William Jackson with forgery, he having, by falsifying certain books and papers, and forging the names of the late Mr. Mapleton and his son William at various times, perverted to his own and his brother's use, property and money to the value of nearly half a million dollars, which rightly belongs to the widow and heirs of the late Mr. Mapleton."

Mr. Jackson was the first to recover his presence of mind. He was very indignant. "Your honor," he said, "I protest against this treatment. My brother and I are arrested without warrant on leaving this court on the mere assertion of a policeman, who knows nothing of the facts, and it may be difficut for us to vindicate ourselves at short notice. The charge as to the jewels is an instance. They were placed for safe-keeping in our safe when Mr. Mapleton and I were partners. But he had a perfect right to remove them whenever Mrs. Mapleton wished to wear them. He never thought it necessary to inform me of his doing so, and I never thought it necessary to ask him about them, as they were not my property nor the property of the firm. I believe he took them away before he was taken ill. I do not know; but I know that on making an inventory after his death, we found that they were not in the safe. But how can I prove that Mr. Mapleton removed them?"

"Are you the man referred to as 'Mr. Jackson' by the girl who swooned in court just now?" asked the Judge.

"I believe that it was to me she referred, but she was under a misapprehension."

"Well, Mr. Jackson, your brother is a lawyer, so he will advise you. I shall hold you on this charge, and I can assure you, your rights will be respected. You will get justice."

"Bedad, thot's phat he don't want and is afeared he will get," said Mrs. Callaghan in an audible whisper.

"Mr. Graham, do you intend to present evidence now as to the charges you have brought, or do you wish a remand?"

"These are the jewels, your honor," and he removed the paper covering from a leather case or box, which he had carried under his arm.

As soon as Mr. Jackson caught sight of the leather-covered box, he sank back into his seat and looked as if about to faint; but by a strong effort and use of all his willpower he saved himself. His brother, who was as bad if not a worse man than he, had not his one redeeming trait, courage, but was a coward as well as a rogue, and he now sat with pale face, staring eyes, and chattering teeth; first with one hand and then the other he would give his moustache a nervous twirl.

"Would you recognize your family jewels, if you saw them again, ladies?" Mr. Graham asked, addressing Mrs. and Miss Mapleton.

"Oh, certainly!" answered Mrs. Mapleton, in an agitated voice.

Mr. Graham opened the leather case and displayed its glittering contents.

"Oh! Alice," said Mrs. Mapleton, as she stood with clasped hands, looking into the case. "Oh! Alice, your dear father's presents," and burying her face in her handkerchief, she sank into a chair.

"These, sir," said Graham, addressing the magistrate, "are the jewels that were stolen from the safe in Mr. Mapleton's warehouse, when that gentleman lay on his death-bed. I found them an hour ago, and with the help of a search-warrant, in Mr. Jackson's private office. The box was hidden in a stove-pipe hole in the wall, which had been papered over."

The prisoners were promptly committed.

"May I inquire what amount of bail will be required?" asked Mr. Jackson. "I can assure your honor that this is all a vile conspiracy concocted by a rival firm, with the object of ruining my brother's business, and of course destroying our characters, and all because the late Mr. Mapleton put more confidence in the honorable gentlemen of which my brother's firm is composed (and I may say in myself) than he did in the people whom he had trusted to his sorrow, and who are now trying to bring dishonor upon his memory and ruin to those whom he trusted. It is a case of blackmail—blackmail, I say!" Mr. Jackson had worked himself into a passion, and he shouted the last words so loud they could be heard all over the building.

The brother seemed to be in a state of collapse. He sat with his arms resting on a desk in front of him, and his face buried in his hands.

The papers were made out and the two men removed to the cells, each protesting against "the outrage." Of the two, the lawyer appeared to suffer most. He had been the brains of the conspiracy. He had sat in his office plotting and scheming, and never showing at all. If he and his brother could make a fortune by his plots he cared nothing who was ruined. It was an awful blow to him to be check-mated as he had been that morning.

As the two men passed through the court-yard under the guard of the police. they saw a little group standing together talking. It consisted of Alice and her mother, and Mr. Graham and Mr. Jacobs. Mrs. Callaghan had left the court some time before, after asking Alice to let her have the key to her room, "And it's a cup o'tea I'll be having ready for your mother when she comes," said the kind soul.

Louie and her father stood just within the court-room. "I must speak to her, papa, before they leave," said Louie.

"If you have the courage, my child, do so; but you must be prepared for a cool reception. I confess that I have not the courage just now to do or say what I know should be done and said. We have wronged the innocent and I feel very much ashamed, although I did everything I could to prevent it."

Louie had not taken three steps toward the door when Alice, catching sight of her, rushed toward her and they fell into each other's arms.

"Oh! Alice dear, I could not let you go without asking you to forgive us for all the pain we have caused you and your dear mother to suffer," said Louie.

"Louie, I love you and you know I do. You were always good and kind, and stood by me, and believed in me, when everything look dark, and when I should not have blamed you if you had dou me; and I want you to promise that will not forget me, but will alway b dear friend."

"Alice, dear," said Louie, "there is other bond to bind us together that know nothing about, and that I onl covered to-day, I cannot, dare not tell now, but I will come and see you an you all; you'll let me, won't you dear

"I wonder if I could come in unde daughter's wing and ask for quarter, said Mr. Wilson.

"Excuse me, this is my father, Alice. I do not think you have eve him before," said Louie.

"I am so glad to meet you, Mr. W I know that you did everything you to shield me; so please do not sa word more about it. Let me introduc to mamma."

"There is no need. Mrs. Mapleto I have met before, and I am so glad her again, although, as far as I an cerned, under very unpleasant ci stances. You must think as kindly as your generosity will permit, Mrs. ton. I am afraid it will not be easy f to forgive us. You must try to rem that Mrs. Wilson was deceived. She conscientiously, I am sure; but a know, a person may do a great deal chief while acting quite conscientiou as in this instance, there is a mistak facts."

"I can quite see that," said Mrs. ton. "I am a little bewildered and s to-day, but I know enough of mysel sure I can forgive. I have learned deal since my misfortunes, and one lessons is to be more charitable in m ment of other people. We are but h the best of us. Yes, Mr. Wilson, Alice nor I bear any resentment. give as we hope to be forgiven."

"Thank you, Mrs. Mapleton, y more magnanimous than I could hoped. If we can do anything to ser at any time we shall be delighted. speak for Louie and myself, and I s the rest of the family speak for thems

"Oh, Mr. Wilson," said Alice are very kind. There is really one I am concerned about in which y help. I am afraid for the poor girl w here. The one who took the neckla looked as if she might kill herself something desperate. Could she comforted and encouraged to reform will not be arrested, will she?"

"Louie will see to Nettie, Miss M You may be sure we will do all for her, if your friend here does nc pose," said Mr. Wilson, with a his hand toward Detective Graham Graham shook his head. "N said, "Nettie was a victim, too; w leave her to you, Mr. Wilson, and you will succeed in reclaiming her."

"We will try," said Mr. Wils with a cordial good-bye, he and Lou away.

"How ever can I thank you, M ham," said Alice, "for all you ha for me?"

"I am sufficiently thanked al said the Detective, with a courtly b has been a pleasure to serve yo behaved so nobly and with such courage that I was amazed and de Ladies are so apt to faint or go i terics that I always feel nervous w case depends on them. A lady w times break a fine case completely ting flurried and doing somethin Excuse me for criticizing your se always feel more comfortable wh dealing with men. That makes i greater pleasure to have a case in w lady does as you have done. You steady and strong as a man, Mis ton, and it has been a pleasure you. Perhaps I am treading on ground, but I'd like to say, how t ly glad I am that my friend Mor such a friend"

Alice's blushes revealed that the was as delicate as the Detective in but she controlled herself and as Mr. Morgan was getting on.

"It will do him more good than else to hear of you. He was more about loosing track of you than else. He will be very glad to hear are found. He is now on his way ica, and when he lands and hear you are, you may be sure he w straight to you. And I can tell brings good news."

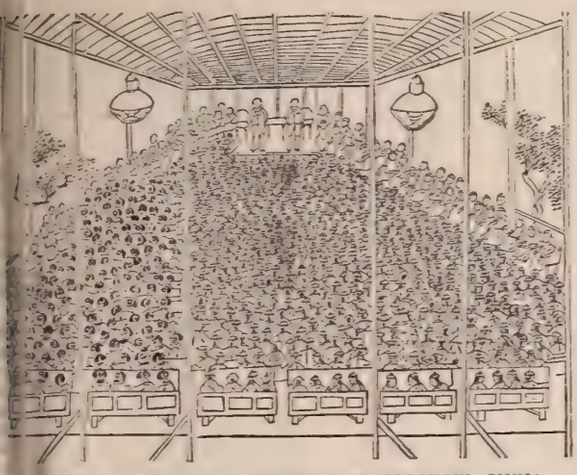
TENT MEETING IN CHINA.

The singular illustration on this page is reproduced from a drawing on rice paper by a Chinese artist, forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Rev. G. S. Miner, missionary working in the Foochow district. Mr. Miner writes thus in explanation:

"One of the crowning events of our Conference season was the coming together of the preachers, teachers, colporteurs, workers, students and friends of the Foochow district for a few days of Gospel and educational meetings. A booth, 75 x 78 feet was erected on the grounds of the Anglo-Chinese College, with a seating capacity of eleven hundred. The week following Conference the people by boat and overland began to arrive, and in the evening Mrs. Mary C. Ninde and Dr. Worley, the P. E. of the district, led a salvation meeting at which hundreds bowed in prayer for pardon. When the opportunity to receive Christ was given, at times as many as three or four were on their feet at once. The following morning Bishop Ninde presented the truth from John 16: 33. After the sermon one hundred and four men, women and children came forward and received the sacrament of baptism from the Bishop's own hand. As these Chinese from all the various classes of life met at the same Christian altar to receive the same baptism from the same hand it seemed as though we could almost hear the Christ hovering o'er us. You, in a Christian land, can hardly comprehend all that such a service means."



GOSPEL MEETING IN A BOOTH, AT FOOCHOW, CHINA.

WORK AMONG NEW YORK JEWS.

REV. H. P. FAUST, whose missionary labors among the East-side Hebrews in New York, have on different occasions been mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, reports encouraging progress during the six months. He has for some time been training several students (young converts from Judaism), for admission to the Theological Seminary, some to study medical missionary work and others as readers of the Word. Owing to the hard times there has been much suffering throughout the East-side and in addition to visiting his students, Dr. Faust has been compelled to aid many destitute in his own charge. His Gospel meetings at 126 Forsyth St., have been very largely attended by Jews, who have been deeply interested in the exposition of the Scriptures. Many have accepted Christianity. During the year from April 1, 1894 to April 1, 1895, he visited 2861 families, distributed 13778 tracts and papers, and 1134 parts of Scripture; gathered 1442 children into the mission school, and 1070 adults into the Bible class; held many prayer meetings, attended 366 other meetings; aggregate attendance at all meetings 18,320; talked with 1406 inquirers after spiritual light, assisted 590 poor and destitute, baptized five, took forty-two converts under instruction.

During the year, Dr. Faust's expenditures for relief and other work in connection with his mission have been considerably in excess of the money received for that purpose. He hopes soon to be able to establish an Industrial Home in connection with the Mission.

IN HIS KEEPING.

FATHER, the way seems rough and steep,
I try to watch and pray,
Why do so many shadows dark,
Fall right across my way?

"Be still, and know that I am God,
I know things all in all,
Just when to let the sunlight shine,
And when the shadows fall."

Holton, Kan.

CONSUMPTION

can, without doubt, be cured in its early stages. It is a battle from the start, but with the right kind of weapons properly used it can be overcome and the insidious foe vanquished. Hope, courage, proper exercise, will-power, and the regular and continuous use of the best nourishing food-medicine in existence—

Scott's Emulsion

—the wasting can be arrested, the lungs healed, the cough cured, bodily energies renewed and the physical powers made to assert themselves and kill the germs that are beginning to find lodgment in the lungs. This renowned preparation, that has no doubt cured hundreds of thousands of incipient cases of Comsumption, is simply Cod-liver Oil emulsified and made palatable and easy of assimilation, combined with the Hypophosphites, the great bone, brain and nerve tonic.

The Age of Reason

Is the name given frequently to this present century. We have outgrown old fogy notions. Because "our grandmothers used lard" is no argument in favor of it to-day. They had good lard, far different from the present factory product. Physicians found that much of the prevailing dyspepsia and indigestion was due to the use of lard in the preparation of food. Then modern science came to the front, and Cottolene was evolved. When the history of our time is written it will be known also as

The Age of Cottolene

The only substitute for lard. Made of pure cotton seed oil and beef suet, it is the only healthful shortening known. Like other successful preparations, Cottolene has many imitators.

REMEMBER THIS. The genuine is put up in one, three and five pound tins with the trade mark—a steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin. Made only by A MISSIONARY'S STRATAGEM.

IN a very interesting record of pioneer missionary experience in New Zealand many notable incidents in the careers of such self-sacrificing Christian workers as Samuel Marsden, Bishop Selwyn and others, are related showing how the Lord preserves the lives and forwards the work of his faithful servants amid many dangers.

At the close of the year 1826 Marsden prepared to make his fourth journey to New Zealand, and heard with much concern that disastrous changes had taken place in the attitude of the natives, and that the Weslevan missionaries had only escaped with their lives. The Rev. Samuel Leigh had arrived as Wesleyan missionary to New Zealand not very long after the massacre of the crew and passengers of the "Boyd" had filled the minds of the people with horror. Undismayed, he landed very near to the spot where the "Boyd" had been wrecked. The native boatmen, fearing an approaching storm, had laid themselves on the bottom of the boat, as dead men, and left the navigation of the boat to the English missionary. Thus it was that it drifted into Wangaroa Harbor, and when he set his foot on shore he noticed the hulk of the "Boyd" not far distant on the rocks, and a crowd of wild savages rushing down to the beach brandishing their weapons on his approach.

He asked for the chief, and went unarmed and alone to a hut to spend the night, not to sleep, for the clamor of the cannibals was deafening in the darkness. This chief on the morrow talked in broken English about the massacre and eating of the people of the "Boyd" with perfect unconcern, and Mr. Leigh, suspecting treachery, signed to his native boatmen to keep well inland, waiting for him. In a few minutes he was surrounded by threatening and armed savages, the chief, upon whom he had relied, looking on without any gesture of disapproval. As he slowly turned backward toward the boat, he felt his hour had come, when suddenly taking a packet from his pocket, he cried, "Stand back! I have fishhooks," and flung them over their heads. This turned their attention for a moment or two, and he escaped in his boat as by a miracle.

CHINA'S GOSPEL NEED.

Nowhere in the world, says a well-informed writer in a Leipzig jonrnal, are the educated classes so thoroughly materialistic or at least atheistic, as is the case in China. The classical commentators of the Sung dynasty during the last seven centuries so thoroughly undermined the faith of the educated sections of China's population in regard to everything divine, that this faith has been thoroughly bankrupted. That which is called "religion" in China is in reality a chaos, such as has but rarely been found in the history of human thought and life, and this can be understood only in connection with the complete decay of the Chinese type of civilization. The religious forms and moral systems of Taoism, Buddhism, or Confucianism have been compared to three serpents. The first serpent, Buddhism, swallowed up Taoism except the head. Then Taoism swallowed up Confucianism, the third serpent, all but the head, and this third serpent, with an immense jaw, found the tail of the first serpent and swallowed up this serpent entire with the exception of the head; so that in the end only the three heads were visible, and the three religions, as the Chinese philosophers are accustomed to claim with considerable pride, become one. But what a lamentably miserable religious life this religion produces! Thousands of Chinese families at the end of each year dash honey and sugar on the lips of their kitchen household gods, so that these, in their yearly trips to the heavenly regions, may make a favorable report of the conduct of the family during these twelve months. Examples could be multiplied almost endlessly to show that the modern religious culture of China is a mere ceremonial service, and a trade affair in which the Chinaman gets the good portion and the god the poor. China is suffering from religious bankruptcy, and yet from this abyss of despair comes the cry to the representatives of Western Christian civilization for help as powerfully as it came to the apostle Paul at Troas as from Macedonia.

HIS OLD HEART WAS GONE.

A New Zealand missionary relates the following conversation between a chief and himself:—He commenced by saying that his old heart was gone, and that a new one was come in its place. "Gone! whither?" "It is buried, I have cast it away from me." "How long has it been gone?" "Four days." "What was your old heart like?" "Like a dog, like a deaf man; it would not listen to the missionaries, nor understand." "How long have you had your old heart?" "Always till now, but it is now gone." "What is your new heart like?" "Like yours; it is very good." "Where is its goodness?" "It is altogether good; it tells me, to lie down and sleep all day Sunday, and not go out and fight." "Is that all the goodness of your new heart" "Yes." "Does it not tell you to pray to the Lord Jesus Christ?" "Yes; it tells me I must pray to him when the sun rises, when the sun stands in the middle of the heavens, and when the sun sets." "When did you pray last?" "This morning." "What did you pray for?" "I said, O Jesus Christ, give me a blanket in order that I may believe." "I fear your old heart still remains, does it not?" "No; the new one is quite fixeed; it is here," pointing to his throat." "But the new heart that comes from God does not pray in that way." "How then?" The missionary then proceeded to point out to him something of the nature of prayer; what he should pray for; and how ready and willing God was to answer. "As I was leaving," says the misionary, "he told me that I must ask him, on coming again to his residence, whether he remembered what I had now said, and that, if he had forgotten it, I must tell him all about it over and over again."

WOUNDED.

HE hears thy voiceless sorrow, though
No outward sign you make;
And sees the life-blood dripping
When the wounded heart-strings break;
Healing in tenderest pity, for
The dear Christ's sake.
As quivering lips press the bitter cup,
And tears from sad eyes fall,
Close to his bosom lean thy face
For oh! he knows it all!

Thou'st walked with him in sorrow
And looked on His face divine,
'Till the impress of its beauty
Is stamped on soul of thine; [eyes
From pain-shadowed depths, thine eager
With the light of a great peace shine;
Where the silence of grief hath fallen
The touch of the Master thrills.
As the flowing wine of His gracious love
Life's emptied chalice fills.

The stricken deer seeks covert,
The wounded bird her nest;
And thy broken heart finds refuge
Where the dear God gives it rest,
Patiently waiting the glory,
Believing he knows best.
While earthlife is wrecked and storm-toss'd
Where waves roll waves to meet,
Thy soul like some pearl, stranded,
Is laid at the Master's feet.

Out from thy sin and sorrow,
And the cleansing fire of pain,
Go, bare thy head to the sunshine,
The storm and the bitter rain.
There are hurt lives all around us,
Heart-hungry and broken with pain.
The peace and gladness of heaven to hearts
That forgive are thus made known;
In giving thy life for others
The Christ-life shall be thy own.

ooklyn, Mich. —MRS. ALMERA CLARK.

AN IMMEDIATE SALVATION.

Canon Wilberforce used to take great asure in telling a pathetic story, illustrat- the force of the word "now." A coal ner, hearing the Gospel preached, deter- ned that if there were any truth in the omise of immediate salvation, he would t rise from his knees or leave the minis- who had declared the message, until he t that he was saved. He accordingly ited after the meeting to speak with the nister, and in his untutored way, said: Didn't ye say I could have the blessin' w?" "Yes, my friend." "Then pray th me, for I'm not goin' awa' wi'out it." d they did pray, these two men, until the estling miner heard the silent words of nfort and cheer. "I've got it now!" ed the miner, his face reflecting the joy thin; "I've got it now!" The next day rightful accident occurred at the mines. e same minister was called to the scene, d among the men dead and dying, was quivering, almost breathless body of man who, only the night before, big d brawny, came to him to know if sal- tion could really be had for the asking. ere was but a fleeting moment of recog- ion between the two ere the miner's soul k flight; but in that moment he had e to say, in response to the minister's mpathy, "Oh, I don't mind, for I've got -I've got it—its mine!" Then the name the poor man went in the list of the illed." There was no note made of the al inheritance to which he had but a few rs before come into possession, and all his believing grip of the word "now."

A TRACT CHANGED HIS LIFE.

God sometimes chooses the most remark- e and unexpected incidents as instru- nts to draw men to himself. An emi- t Christian preacher, the late Dean emantle, of Ripon, used to take especial asure in telling this story of his own con- sion: He had never felt strongly the d of personal religion until the close of university career. About that time in life, a near relative of his, having just e into an estate, invited the young duate to stay with him for the express pose of helping him to sift down a some- at large library. He gave himself with siderable zest to the work, and while he s engaged in it, there happened to drop of an old folio, a discolored Puritan tract of the Restoration period, entitled, "Drops of Honey out of the Rock Jesus." At first he dipped into it partly out of curiosity, attracted by the quaint title, and partly to find amusement therefrom; little dreaming that the old-fashioned treatise of 150 years back was to become God's instrument for changing the whole current of his life. Before he got very far in the tract, he was sufficiently struck by it to hide it away in his pocket in order that he might study it more at his leisure in his bed-room. The quiet perusal of it alone in the presence of God brought conviction to his soul, and awakened desires which soon bore fruit to eternal life.

A MISSION FOR LIFE-SAVERS.

"The Marine Life-Saving Mission" is the name of a new mission that is now being organized by Rev. R. Ashley Cake, at the Life Saving Stations along the New Jersey Coast. Mr. Cake travels along the coast from Barnegat to South Brigantine, and preaches the Gospel at every station. Many souls are being won.

Missionary Arnold's Floating Chapel and its Travels Along the Great Western Rivers—A Unique and Blessed Evangelical Work.

of the most interesting and success- ful evangelical experiments of the latter description is that begun several years ago by a devoted Christian worker and missionary, Mr. I. R. B. Arnold, on the great waterways of the West. Together, with his family, and with Mr. C. H. Nichols, his associate, Mr. Arnold has spent the greater part of the last four years, on the Mississippi, Ohio, and Illinois rivers, and their tributaries, in a Floating Chapel or house-boat. Mr. Arnold is a native of Illinois, and for twenty years he has been engaged in missionary work. In 1888 he was sent by the American Missionary Society of Chicago to labor in the South along the Mississippi river. For two years he worked among the freedmen, traveling long distances by boat, and camping wherever other accommodations could not be had. That experience suggested to him the practicability of using in the work a much larger boat, which should serve the double purpose of chapel and home, and the result was the construction of the Floating Chapel shown in the illustration on this page. It is the largest floating Gospel structure in the United States at the present time, being thirty by one hundred and twenty feet, with auditorium, class-rooms, and living rooms for the missionary, his family, and manager, and a few helpers. In addition to its other equipment, the boat has a small printing office, and a good deal of the literature used in the work—in the form of tracts, etc.,—is there prepared. The Floating Chapel has proved a most valuable aid, and the river mission has been greatly blessed, especially in the last four years, in the inbringing of many precious souls. Concerning his work generally, Missionary Arnold gives this interesting explanation: "When I was a boy, it seemed so strange to read about the Chinese, many of whom lived in boats or houses anchored on the water, or tied to the bank. I did not then think I should ever see thousands of these house-boats along the rivers of our own country. Some are inhabited by fishermen; others by laborers, who find it cheaper to live in a floating-house than to live in one on land. If work is scarce in one place, the house-boat can be moved up or down the river. In this way, a man can move, without packing his goods, and can change his place of residence as often as he wishes. Some of these boats are very poor shells, cheaply built; others are larger and as nicely furnished and painted as any houses on land. Some are mere saloons or gambling dens.

A CONVICT AUDIENCE

"Most of the people who live on these house-boats," he continued, "are without the Gospel. Their children have no schooling. We always try to give them a plentiful supply of good reading. It is, on the whole very pleasant, as well as healthful, living on the water."

It is economical, too, as he explained. At some of the landings the only stores in the place are those kept on boats. Occasionally, meetings are held in log-houses on shore. At most of the landing-places, the people are very poor and cannot support regular preaching; yet it is sometimes painfully clear that they spend money enough on liquor to build churches and support teachers. Most of them live in small log-houses, with one or two rooms where children and dogs are crowded together. One man, with whom the missionary took dinner, had about twenty dogs, valued at several hundred dollars. This man, who is quite a substantial citizen for his class, offered to give $150 toward building a church.

One of the principal advantages of the Floating Chapel, is that it is common ground. All classes attend the service. It has a seating capacity of about 500, equal to half a dozen ordinary country school-houses. Some of the localities visited by the Floating Chapel show the greatest need of Gospel work. There the densest ignorance prevails on secular as well as religious matters. "I can't read, but some of my children can read it to me," is a frequent expression, when a tract is given.

"THE FLOATING CHAPEL," OR MISSIONARY BOAT, AT AN OHIO RIVER LANDING.

"THE GREATEST SOLDIER OF ALL TIME."

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., preached last Sunday in Embury Memorial Church, Brooklyn, on the Text: Joshua 1:5: "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

THE "gallant Thirteenth," as this regiment is generally and appropriately called, has gathered to-night for the worship of God, and to hear the annual sermon. And first I look with hearty salutation into the faces of the Veterans who, though now not in active service, have the same patriotic and military enthusiasm which characterized them, when, in 1863, they bade farewell to home and loved ones, and started for the field, and risked all they held dear on earth for the re-establishment of the falling United States Government. "All that a man hath will he give for his life," and you showed yourselves willing to give your lives. We hail you! We thank you! We bless you, the veterans of the Thirteenth. Nothing can ever rob you of the honor of having been soldiers in one of the most tremendous wars of all history, a war with Grant, and Sherman, and Hancock, and Sheridan, and Farragut on one side, and Lee, and Stonewall Jackson, and Longstreet, and Johnstone on the other. As in Greek assemblages, when speakers would rouse the audience, they shouted "Marathon!" so if I wanted to stir you to acclamation, I would only need to speak the words, "Look-out Mountain," "Chancellorsville," "Gettysburg." And though through the passage of years you are forever free from duty of enlistment, if European nations should too easily and too quickly forget the Monroe doctrine, and set aggressive foot upon this continent, I think your ankles would be supple again, and your arms would grow strong again, and your eye would be keen enough to follow the stars of the old flag wherever they might lead.

And next, I greet the Colonel and his staff, and all the officers and men of this regiment. It has been an eventful year in your history. If never before, Brooklyn appreciates something of the value of its armories, and the importance of the men who there drill for the defense and safety of the city. The blessing of God be upon all of you, my comrades of the Thirteenth Regiment! And looking about for a subject that might be most helpful and inspiring for you, and our veterans here assembled, and the citizens gathered to-night with their good wishes, I have concluded to hold up before you the greatest soldier of all time—Joshua, the hero of my text.

He was a magnificent fighter, but he always fought on the right side, and he never fought unless God told him to fight. In [illegible] one would think it must have been plumed helmet for the brow, greaves of brass for the feet, habergeon for the breast. "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life." "Oh," you say, "anybody could have courage with such a backing up as that." Why, my friends, I have to tell you that the God of the universe and the Chieftain of eternity promises to do just as much for us as for him. All the resources of eternity are pledged in our behalf, if we go out in the service of God, and no more than that was offered to Joshua. God fulfilled this promise of my text, although Joshua's first battle was with the spring freshet; and the next with a stone wall; and the next, leading on a regiment of whipped cowards; and the next battle, against darkness, wheeling the sun and the moon into his battalion, and the last, against the King of Terrors, Death—five great victories.

For the most part, when the general of an army starts out in a conflict he would like to have a small battle in order that he may get his courage up and he may rally his troops and get them drilled for greater conflicts; but this first undertaking of Joshua was greater than the levelling of Fort Pulaski, or the thundering down of Gibraltar, or the overthrow of the Bastille. It was the crossing of the Jordan at the time of the spring freshet. The snows of Mount Lebanon had just been melting and they poured down into the valley, and the whole valley was a raging torrent. So the Canaanites stand on one bank and they look across and see Joshua and the Israelites, and they laugh and say: "Aha! aha! they cannot disturb us until the freshets fall; it is impossible for them to reach us." But after a while they look across the water and they see a movement in the army of Joshua. They say, "What's the matter now? Why there must be a panic among these troops, and they are going to fly, or perhaps they are going to try to march across the river Jordan. Joshua is a lunatic." But Joshua, the chieftain of the text, looks at his army and cries: "Forward, march!" and they start for the bank of the Jordan.

One mile ahead go two priests carrying a glittering box four feet long and two feet wide. It is the Ark of the Covenant. And they come down, and no sooner do they just touch the rim of the water with their feet, than by an Almighty fiat, Jordan parts. The army of Joshua marches right on without getting their feet wet, over the bottom of the river, a path of chalk and broken shells and pebbles, until they get to the other bank. Then they lay hold of the oleanders and tamarisks and willows and pull themselves up a bank thirty or forty feet high, and having gained the other bank, they clap their shields and their cymbals, and sing the praises of the God of Joshua. But no sooner have they reached the bank than the waters begin to dash and roar, and with a terrific rush they break loose from their strange anchorage. Out yonder they have stopped, thirty miles up yonder they halted. On this side the waters roll off toward the salt sea. But as the hand of the Lord God is taken away from the thus uplifted waters—waters perhaps uplifted half a mile—as the Almighty hand is taken away, those waters rush down, and some of the unbelieving Israelites say: "Alas, alas, what a misfortune! Why could not those waters have stayed parted? because perhaps we may want to go back. Oh Lord, we are engaged in a risky business. Those Canaanites may eat us up. How if we want to go back? Would it not have been a more complete miracle if the Lord had parted the waters to let us come through and kept them parted to let us go back if we are defeated?" My friends, God makes no provision for a Christian's retreat. He clears the path all the way to Canaan. To go back is to die. The same gatekeepers that swing back the amethystine and crystalline gate of the Jordan to let Israel pass through, now swing shut the amethystine and crystalline gate of the Jordan to keep the Israelites from going back. I declare it in your hearing to-day, victory ahead, water forty feet deep in the rear. Triumph ahead, Canaan ahead; behind you death and darkness and woe and hell. But you say: "Why didn't those Canaanites, when they had such a splendid chance—standing on the top of the bank thirty or forty feet high, completely demolish those poor Israelites down in the river?" I will tell you why. God had made a promise and he was going to keep it. "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

But this is no place for the host to stop. Joshua gives the command, "Forward, march!" In the distance there is a long grove of trees, and at the end of the grove is a city. It is a city of arbors, a city with walls seeming to reach to the heavens, to buttress the very sky. It is the great metropolis that commands the mountain pass. It is Jericho. That city was afterward captured by Pompey, and it was afterward captured by Herod the Great, and it was afterward captured by the Mohammedans; but this campaign the Lord plans. There shall be no swords, no shields, no battering ram. There shall be only one weapon of war, and that a ram's horn. The horn of the slain ram was sometimes taken and holes were punctured in it, and then the musician would put the instrument to his lips, and he would run his fingers over this rude musical instrument, and make a great deal of sweet harmony for the people. That was the only kind of weapon. Seven priests were to take these rude rustic musical instruments, and they were to go around the city every day for six days—once a day for six days, and then on the seventh day they were to go around blowing these rude musical instruments seven times, and then at the close of the seventh blowing of the rams' horns on the seventh day the peroration of the whole scene was to be a shout at which those great walls should tumble from capstone to base.

The seven priests with the rude musical instruments pass all around the city walls on the first day, and a failure. Not so much as a piece of plaster broke loose from the wall—not so much as a loosened rock, not so much as a piece of mortar lost from its place. "There," say the unbelieving Israelites, "didn't I tell you so? Why, those ministers are fools. The idea of going around the city with those musical instruments and expecting in that way to destroy it! Joshua has been spoiled; he thinks because he has overthrown and destroyed the spring freshet, he can overthrow the stone wall. Why, it is not philosophic. Don't you see there is no relation between the blowing of these musical instruments and the knocking down of the wall. It isn't philosophy." And I suppose there were many wiseacres who stood with their brows knitted, and with the forefinger of the right hand to the forefinger of the left hand, arguing it all out, and showing it was not possible that such a cause should produce such an effect. And I suppose that night in the encampment there was plenty of philosophy and caricature, and if Joshua had been nominated for any high military position, he would not have got many votes. Joshua's stock was down. The second day, the priests blowing the musical instruments go around the city, and a failure. Third day, and a failure; fourth day, and a failure; fifth day, and a failure; sixth day, and a failure. The seventh day comes, the climacteric day. Joshua is up early in the morning and examines the troops, walks all around about, looks at the city wall. The priests start to make the circuit of the city. They go all around once, all around twice, three times, four times, five times, six times, seven times, and a failure.

There is only one more thing to do now that is to utter a great shout. I see the Israelitish army straightening themselves up, filling their lungs for a vociferation such as was never heard before and never heard after. Joshua feels that the hour has come, and he cries out to his host: "Shout for the Lord hath given you the city! And the people begin to cry: "Down, Joshua, down Jericho!' and the long line of solid masonry begins to quiver and to move and to rock. Stand from under. Shelter! Crash! go the walls, the temple the towers, the palaces; the air is black with the dust. The huzza of the victorious Israelites and the groan of the conquered Canaanites commingle, and Joshua standing there in the debris of the wall, hears a voice saying: "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

But Joshua's troops may not have rested. The command is, "Forward, march!" There is the city of Ai; it must be captured. How shall it be taken? A scouting party comes back and says: "Joshua, we can do that without you; it is going to be a very easy job: you just stay here while we can capture it." They march with a small detachment in front of that city. The men of Ai look at them and give one yell, and the Israelites run like reindeers. The men of the troops at Bull Run did not make such time as these Israelites with the Canaanites after them. They never cut such a figure as when they were on the run. Anybody that goes out in the battle of God with only half a force, instead of taking the men of Ai, the men of Ai take you. Look at the Church of God in the retreat. The Bornesian cannibals eat up Munson the missionary. "Fall back!" said a great many Christian people. Fall back oh Church of God! Borneo will be taken. Don't you see the Bornesian cannibals have eaten up Munson the missionary?" Tyndall delivers his lecture in the University of Glasgow, and a great many good people say, "Fall back, oh Church of God! Dont you see that Christian philosophy is going to be overcome by infidel philosophy? Fall back!" Geology plunges its crowbar into the mountains, and there are a great many people who say, "Scientific investigation is going to overthrow the Mosaic account of the creation. Fall back!" Friends of God have never any right to fall back.

Joshua falls on his face in chagrin. It is the only time you ever see the back of his head. He falls on his face and begins to whine, and he says, "Oh, Lord God, wherefore hast thou at all brought this people over Jordan to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us? Would God we had been content and dwelt on the other side of Jordan! For the Canaanites and all the inhabitants of the land shall hear of it, and shall environ us round and cut off our name from the earth."

I am very glad Joshua said that, for it seemed as if he were a supernatural being, and therefore could not be an example to us; but I find he is a man, he is a weak man. Just as sometimes you find a man under severe opposition, or in a bad state of physical health, or worn out with hard work, lying down and sighing about everything being defeated, I am encouraged when I hear this cry of Joshua as he lies in the dust.

God comes and rouses him. How does he rouse him? By complimentary apostrophe? No. He says, "Get thee up. Wherefore liest thou upon thy face?" Joshua rises, and I warrant you, with a mortified look. But his old courage comes back. The fact was, that was the battle. If he had been in it he would have gone on to victory. He gathers his men around him and says: "Now let us go up and capture the city of Ai; let us go right away."

They march on. He puts the ma[illegible]

e troops behind a ledge of rocks in the ght, and then he sends a comparatively hall battalion up in front of the city. The en of Ai come out with a shout. This ttalion in stratagem fall back and fall ck, and when all the men of Ai have left e city and are in pursuit of this scattered, seemingly scattered battalion, Joshua nds on a rock—I see his locks flying in e wind as he points his spear towards the omed city, and that is the signal. The en rush out from behind the rocks and ce the city, and it is put to the torch, and en these Israelites in the city march down d the flying battalion of Israelites return, id between these two waves of Israelitish bwess the men of Ai are destroyed, and e Israelites gain the victory; and while I e the curling smoke of that destroyed city the sky, and while I hear the huzza of e Israelites and the groan of the Canaan-s, Joshua hears something louder than all, ringing and echoing through his soul, here shall not any man be able to stand fore thee all the days of thy life."

But this is no place for the host of Jos-a to stop. "Forward, march!" cries shua to the troops. There is the city of beon. It has put itself under the protec-n of Joshua. They sent word, "There are e kings after us; they are going to de-oy us; send troops quick; send us help ht away." Joshua has a three days' rch more than double quick. On the rning of the third day he is before the emy. There are two long lines of battle. he battle opens with great slaughter, but e Canaanites soon discover something. ey say, "That is Joshua; that is the n who conquered the spring freshet and locked down the stone wall and destroyed e city of Ai. There is no use fighting." d they sound a retreat, and as they be-n to retreat, Joshua and his host ing upon them like a panther, pursuing m over the rocks.

"Oh!" says Joshua, "this is surely a tory.' 'But do you not see the sun is ing down? Those Amorites are going get away after all, and they will come some other time and bother us, and per-ps destroy us." See, the sun is going wn. Oh, for a longer day than has er been seen in this climate! Pointing e hand at the descending sun and the ner hand at the faint crescent of the on, in the name of that God who shaped worlds and moves the worlds, he cries: un, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and u moon, in the valley of Ajalon." And y stood still. Whether it was by re-ction of the sun's rays, or by the stop-ng of the whole planetary system, I do t know, and do not care. I leave it to Christian scientists and the infidel sci-ists to settle that question, while I tell u I have seen the same thing. "What!" y you, "not the sun standing still?" Yes. e same miracle is performed nowadays. e wicked do not live out half their day, d the sun sets at noon. But let a man rt out and battle for God, and the truth, d against sin, and the day of his useful-ss is prolonged, and prolonged, and pro-ged.

John Summerfield was a consumptive thodist. He looked fearfully white, I told, as he stood in old Sands Street urch in this city, preaching Christ, and en he stood on the anniversary platform New York, pleading for the Bible until usual and unknown glories rolled forth m that book. When he was dying his ow was brushed with the wings of the gel from the skies, the messenger that d sent down. Did John Summerfield's n set? Did John Summerfield's day d? Oh no! He lives on in his burning erance in behalf of the Christian Church. e sun stood still.

Robert McCheyne was a consumptive sbyterian. It was said when he preach-he coughed so it seemed as if he would ver preach again. His name is fragrant all Christendom, that name mightier day than was ever his living presence. lived to preach the Gospel in Aberdeen, inburgh, and Dundee, but he went away very early. He preached himself into the grave. Has Robert McCheyne's sun set? Is Robert McCheyne's day ended? Oh, no! His dying delirium was filled with prayer, and when he lifted his hand to pronounce the benediction upon his family, and the benediction upon his country, he seemed to say: "I cannot die now; I want to live on and on. I want to start an influence for the Church that will never cease. I am only thirty years of age. Sun of my Christian ministry, stand still over Scotland." And it stood still.

But it is time for Joshua to go home. He is a hundred and ten years old. Washington went down the Potomac, and at Mount Vernon closed his days. Wellington died peacefully at Apsley House. Now, where shall Joshua rest? Why, he is to have his greatest battle now. After a hundred and ten years he has to meet a king who has more subjects than all the present population of the earth, his throne a pyramid of skulls, his parterre the graveyards and the cemeteries of the world, his chariot the world's hearse—the King of Terrors. But if this is Joshua's greatest battle, it is going to be Joshua's greatest victory. He gathers his friends around him and gives his valedictory, and it is full of reminiscence. Young men tell what they are going to do; old men tell what they have done. And as you have heard a grandfather, or a great-grandfather, seated by the evening fire, tell of Monmouth, or Yorktown, and then lift the crutch or staff as though it were a musket, to fight, and show how the old battles were won—so Joshua gathers his friends around his dying couch, and he tells them the story of what he has been through, and as he lies there, his white locks snowing down on his wrinkled forehead, I wonder if God has kept his promise all the way through—the promise of the text. As he lies there he tells the story one, two, or three times—you have heard old people tell a story two or three times over—and he answers:

"I go the way of all the earth, and not one word of the promise has failed, not one word thereof has failed; all has come to pass, not one word thereof has failed." And then he turns to his family, as a dying parent will, and says: "Choose now whom you will serve, the God of Israel, or the God of the Amorites. As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

Dead, the old chieftain must be laid out. Handle him very gently; that sacred body is over a hundred and ten years of age. Lay him out, stretch out those feet that walked dry shod the parted Jordan. Close those lips which helped blow the blast at which the walls of Jericho fell. Fold the arm that lifted the spear toward the doomed city of Ai. Fold it right over the heart that exulted when the five kings fell. But where shall we get the burnished granite for the headstone and the footstone? I bethink myself now. I imagine that for the head it shall be the sun that stood still upon Gibeon, and for the foot, the moon that stood still in the valley of Ajalon.

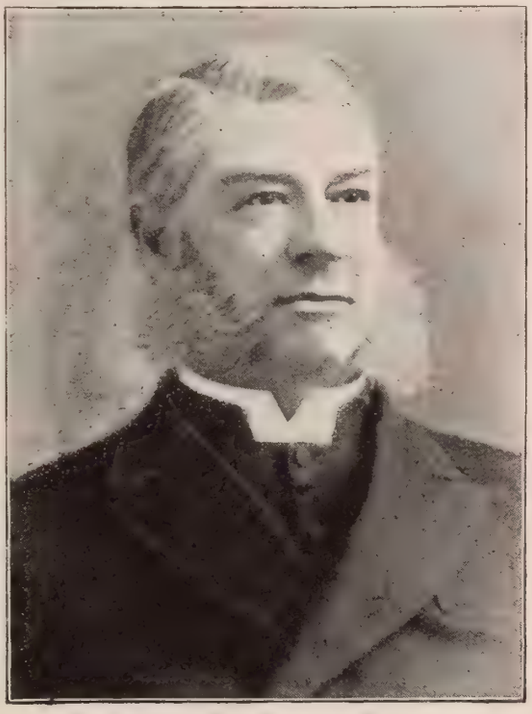
Presbyterian Commissioners at Pittsburgh Elect Dr. R. R. Booth, of New York, Moderator of the Assembly.

PRESBYTERIANS in all sections of the country will be glad to see the portrait on this page. It is that of the Rev. Robert Russell Booth, D.D., LL.D., whom the one hundred and seventh Assembly has elected to the highest position in the church. It is an honor of which any Presbyterian minister may be proud, as it indicates the respect and confidence of his brother ministers and of the most prominent laymen in the church. Dr. Booth was elected on the first ballot by a substantial majority over his two competitors, and the election was afterwards made unanimous. Dr. Booth is a New Yorker by birth as well as by residence. He is sixty-five years of age, and has been thirty-seven years in the ministry. After graduating from Williams and Auburn, he became assistant pastor of a church at Troy, and subsequently of the First Presbyterian Church at Stamford, Conn. In 1861, he was installed as pastor of the Mercer St. Presbyterian Church of New York, which, about ten years afterward, united with the University Place Church, Dr. Booth becoming the pastor of the combined churches. About eleven years ago he realized that a period of rest was necessary after the arduous labors of twenty-three years. He therefore resigned and took an extended tour in Europe. On his return, he was called to the pastorate of the new church on the Boulevard, known as the Rutgers Riverside Church which has become under his charge one of the strongest churches in the city. Dr. Booth is, of course, as may be inferred by his election to the moderatorship a member of the conservative party in the church.



REV. ROBERT RUSSELL BOOTH, D.D., LL.D.
Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly.

The fact that three hundred members of the Assembly voted for Dr. Booth indicates the character of the body. It stands as resolutely for orthodoxy in opposition to Dr. Briggs and the school of the higher criticism as did its predecessors. Happily, at this Assembly there were no heretics to be arraigned, but the Assembly had the duty of drawing closer and tighter the bonds of orthodoxy at the source and origin of the trouble. During the preceding year a committee has been at work trying to make arrangements with the various colleges, by which the Assembly shall have greater power in controlling them. The object is to make it impossible for a Presbyterian college to retain professors of whose teaching the Assembly does not approve. The scheme does not receive the unqualified support even of the conservative element in the church, as it is felt to be an anomaly to make the busy, working pastors who constitute the Assembly, the judges of men whose learning and culture make them qualified to occupy the position of professors in colleges. It was felt, however, that wealthy Presbyterians would feel more secure in leaving money to colleges if they had the assurance that the Assembly had the power to prevent heterodoxy being taught there.

A Pulpit in a House-Boat.

As an example of the destitution that is frequently encountered, a single typical experience may be mentioned: Mrs. Arnold and her daughters visited a colored family on shore at one Green river landing-place. Their house was built on blocks about four feet high to keep it above water when the river rises above its banks. A box served for a table. There were many children, but no chairs. A few rags piled on the floor served as bedding. Besides her own household tasks the mother cooked for the workers at a sawmill, some distance off. A short, cheering talk and an earnest prayer completed the first visit. Mrs. Arnold sent them some second-hand clothing, which was sorely needed for the children.

Missionary Arnold's Floating Chapel has had a most varied experience. It was built at New Martinville, W. Va., at a cost of $2000, and has fulfilled every expectation. Four years have been spent in visiting points on the Ohio river and its tributaries. From Cairo, the boat came up the Mississippi into the Illinois river, and it has done much excellent Gospel service on all these great waterways, and also on the Green river above its junction with the Ohio. Probably little less than 20,000 miles have been traveled by the river missionary and his family in this strange, yet commodious craft. In the cold weather, its progress is southward; in the warm weather its field is northerly. It is never idle nor long at anchor, if the indefatigable missionary can prevent it. In the last four years, Mr. Arnold has delivered 1,500 Gospel addresses and lectures, distributed five tons of literature, visited 150 cities and towns, and addressed 150 mass meetings, in the interest of temperance. More than 250,000 people have passed into his boat. His audiences are strangely varied; some times the gathering will be almost wholly white men and women; again it may be chiefly negroes, for much of his Mississippi work is among the freedmen. At other times, he has an assemblage of children, belonging to some settlement which is fortunate in having a Sunday School. Occasionally the Floating chapels auditorum is occupied by an audience composed of convicts from gangs at work along the river banks. No opportunity to sow the Gospel seed is ever neglected, and a halt is made wherever an audience can be gathered. The services are so conducted as to attract and impress even the poorest and most ignorant, for culture and education are strangers to most of the colored and poor white population along these rivers. The boat is now at La Salle, Ill. Its expenses for four years have been $7,600, and in the same time the receipts from donations were $1,200, and the collections $8,600, so that the Gospel Chapel has been a self-sustaining mission from the outset up to the present time. On different occasions, clergymen of various parishes have voluntarily aided in the services when the boat was in their locality. Early in the present season, three university students from Chicago tendered their services to help in spreading the Gospel along the rivers and great waterways. There are certain points in Mr. Arnold's manner of working that mark it as unique. He does not preach or exhort; he simply instructs. In the simplest words, the old, old story of the Gospel is told, and the hearts and understandings of the poor whites and negroes are reached by homely and familiar illustration.

One of the adjuncts of the work is a powerful lime-light stereopticon, which appeals to a much larger class than could be reached by ordinary talk. A hymn is thrown upon the canvas, and then a picture illustrating the spirit of the verses, and while these are being shown, the audience sings with more energy and a better understanding than would be the case without this object lesson. Bible scenes, temperance and social studies, and other subjects are displayed on the canvas, the whole combining to exert an educational and evangelizing influence which never fails to calm the rough audiences that are frequently met at the river landing-places, and to fix their minds upon the things of eternity.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

THE WALK TO EMMAUS.

S. S. Lesson for June 9. Luke 24: 44-53. Golden Text Luke 24:32. By Mrs. Baxer.

BEFORE he ascended in heaven, the Lord Jesus must wean his disciples. They had known him after the flesh (II.Cor. 5: 16); now they must know him so no more. Their earthly hopes in him had been disappointed; the acknowledgment of the multitudes that he was the Son of David, when he rode upon the colt into Jerusalem, had been followed by his apprehension, condemnation and execution as a malefactor, could it be that they had been deceived? Alas for them that the one gleam of light which would have illuminated everything but which, seen after the flesh, was so dark, had not yet penetrated them; "they knew not the Scriptures that he must rise from the dead." (John 20: 9). Like of its mother, they mourned over the expectations and ambitions they had lost, and the Lord's words so calculated to prepare them for what had happened, were not yet apprehended by them; "It is expedient for you that I go away, for if I go not away the Comforter will not come to you; but if I go, I will send him unto you." It was still the resurrection day, the process of weaning was going on: the visible Saviour, the Son of Man, who had walked and talked with them, was, in so mysterious a way, withdrawn from them; their hopes were shattered; there never was another like him; his words, his works, his spirit, all had been so unlike any other man, and yet God had forsaken him at the last, and he had died the death of a malefactor! They were being weaned from things seen and temporal to things unseen and eternal; they must be severed from the visible, living Word of life, whom they could hear, see and handle, that they might know, under the teaching of the Holy Ghost, the power and life of the written Word of God.

Two of them were walking the same day towards a village named Emmaus, and "they communed with each other" concerning the things which had happened and which lay so much upon their hearts. Jesus was no longer with them, or they would certainly have carried their questions to him. But they must learn to commune with One who was not seen, and that through lit up by the Spirit of God. How many young converts have to go through this same weaning process! At the moment of their conversion, the change in themselves, and in their own feelings and view of things is often so startling and so vivid, that they would not entertain the idea that a doubt of God, or a possibility of being stumbled at any of his dealings with them, should ever, for a single moment, enter their hearts. Hath not God said? is not yet their argument, but rather, "I know, I feel, I have experience." But afterwards when the feelings are not so keen, when unexpected tests of faith are applied to them, and things happen quite contrary to their previous experience and present expectation, they are much in the same position as a babe in the process of weaning. They miss the old nourishment, and are not accustomed to the new; they expect from themselves the fervency of mind [illegible] while they have yet to learn to trust the Holy Ghost, who takes of Christ in the Word, and in the circumstances around them, and shows to them his side of all things; his interpretation of the permission of his Father in his dealings with his children.

Jesus drew near, but the two disciples journeying to Emmaus, who "knew not the Scriptures," could not see him who came to fulfil the Scriptures! Oh, how many cannot see God in all the things which are happening around us in this wonderful and critical age because they do not know the Scriptures about the coming of the Lord. They declare that there is nothing exceptional in events which are transpiring, that "all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." (II. Pet. 3: 3, 4). They do not see Scripture being fulfilled before them in the condition of the Jews and of the Holy Land, in the increase of Romanism in Protestant lands, in the developments of socialism and spiritualism, etc.;—their eyes are holden. But Jesus, unknown by them, went with the two disciples, and asked: "What communications are these that ye have one with another, as ye walk? (ver. 17 R.V.) And they stood still, looking sad." Mary Magdalene who knew the Scriptures, had found her Lord again; no sadness remained in her heart—she was weaned.

"One of them named Cleopas, answering, said unto him: Dost thou alone sojourn in Jerusalem and not know the things which are come to pass there in these days?" "What things?" "The things concerning Jesus of Nazareth." Could it be possible that any living man in Jerusalem should be ignorant of that on which issues so tremendous for time and eternity were hanging? Such was the astonished reflection of these two disciples, and they detailed in order the character and life, the unjust condemnation and execution of him whom they mourned, and added, that it was he which should redeem Israel," and betrayed by this one admisssion their ignorance of the Scriptures. And yet they added the story of the resurrection as told by the women who had been at the sepulchre the same morning, but they neither spoke of their confidence in, nor distrust of the story; to them it rested simply upon the personal testimony of the believing women—"as yet they knew not the Scriptures."

But We Hoped

"And he said unto them: O foolish men and slow of heart to believe in all that the prophets have spoken! Behooved it not the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory?" And having sufficiently deprived them of their old nourishment, he commenced to feed them with the new: "Beginning from Moses, and from all the prophets, he intepreted to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself." (ver. 25–27, R.V.) In his priestly prayer for his disciples before he suffered, the Lord had said: "I have given them thy Word." It had been his own nourishment, "spirit and life," (John 6: 63), and he gave them that which he had most prized. His great recommendation of them to the Father was: "Thy have kept thy Word . . . the words which thou gavest me I have given unto them, and they received them." And his petition for them was: "Sanctify them by the truth: thy Word is truth." (John 17: 6-8; 14, 17.) And now he gave them the key to that Holy Scripture, the living Word alone can open the written Word, and these two men had, from that hour

A New Bible.

O how little had they dreamed that in the woman's seed, in the offering of Isaac, in the history of Joseph, in the Passover, the smitten Rock, the manna, in the Psalms of David, as well as in the prophets, major and minor, Christ was to be seen in all the Scriptures! It was a revelation to them: past, present, future stood unveiled and explained before them. Now they knew the Scriptures, the Cross and the Resurrection were all explained, and they were ready to learn about the ascension and the Lord's return. Drawing nigh to the village, as he seemed about to go further, they constrained him to abide with them and share their evening meal; and it was not until he took the loaf and blessed it, and brake and gave to them that their eyes were opened, and they knew him. They knew now from the evidence of their senses, as they had already learned from Scripture, that he was indeed risen from the dead. But it was enough; the work was done; He vanished out of their sight, but they were not dismayed. And they said one to the other: "Was not our heart burning within us while he spake to us in the way, while he opened to us the Scriptures?" They had taken to the Word and the visible presence of the Lord was no longer a necessity. But such a revelation could not be kept to themselves; they must make it known to their fellow disciples. At the very door of the upper room, they were met with the glad tidings: "The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon." And they had their story also to tell, and to awaken in the rest of the company the taste which their Lord had awakened in them for his written Word.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

OUR Lord had been seen twice on that Sunday morning; but still his sorrowing friends could not believe that he had risen. Mary Magdalene reported that she had seen him, but she had to admit that she at first supposed him to be the gardener, which would indicate to the disciples that her recognition had not been very clear. The other women also reported having seen him, but their report was not credited. Two of the followers of Jesus set out, apparently about noon, to walk to Emmaus, a village some seven or eight miles away. One of them, Luke says, was named Cleopas, and the other is not named, but is generally supposed to have been Luke himself. They were evidently not two of the Apostles, as when they returned, they found the eleven gathered together (Luke 24: 33). The tone of the narrative indicates that at least one of the two lived at Emmaus, as they were in a position to invite Jesus to spend the night with them. On the way their talk, as was natural, was on the subject that filled the heart and mind of every follower of Christ. Jesus joined them, but, like the Magdalene, they did not know him. It is useless to speculate on the cause that prevented their recognizing the Lord. We cannot understand what kind of body his must have been, or what clothing he wore, as his own clothing had been distributed among the soldiers at the crucifixion. The subsequent narrative shows that Jesus claimed it was the same body, and the fact of the tomb being empty is confirmation, but evidently there must have been changes wrought in death or resurrection, otherwise Mary at least would have recognized him instantly. Jesus draws them on to talk of his own death, and they frankly tell him of their disappointment. Clearly they thought his cause was lost, and they do not conceal the fact. Incidentally, they refer to the reports of the resurrection, but in a manner implying that they attached no weight to them. Jesus then deals with their disappointment, showing them that it was no untoward thing that had happened, but just what had been predicted. This he showed by citing passages from the Scriptures, and explaining how they applied to him. It is marvellous that such a discourse was not recorded. Such an explanation and commentary by Jesus himself would have been most valuable to us; but no part of it is preserved. Arriving at their journey's end, they urge Jesus to stay with them, and he complies. In the familiar act of breaking the bread and blessing it, they recognize him, and instantly he disappears. They cannot remain, but hurry back to Jerusalem to tell their friends what had occurred. They find them in a similar state of agitation, for Peter is there, telling how he, too, has seen the Lord. The practical lessons are: That the events in our lives which seem to us most disastrous, might if we could understand them, prove to be the blessings appointed of God, as were the sufferings and death of Christ which these men deplored; and, second, that Christ reveals himself still to those that seek light and are willing to listen to him.

THE VILLAGE OF EMMAUS.

Jesus himself drew near. A city missionary says that in going among the people on the east side of New York, he entered a large house which was rented in single rooms. As he came down from the top floor, after making a call on a sick man, he noticed a door standing a little way open. Through the aperture he could see a woman evidently very ill lying in bed. He knocked and entered. The room was dreadfully poor. All around were the evidences of extreme poverty. But on the emaciated face of the sufferer there was a look of ecstatic delight. She lay still with her eyes closed, and at first the visitor thought she was dead; but bending over her, he could see that she still breathed. He moistened her lips with water and did his best to revive her. Presently she gave a deep sigh and opened her eyes. The face was drawn with pain, and she asked wearily who her visitor was. He told her, and she thanked him for calling. She was alone and would be so for several hours until her daughter returned from work in the evening. "I was nearly gone," she said. "I can not live long, and I thought I was dying when you roused me. I have dreaded death all my life; but it was not painful. It seemed to me all alone here that Jesus came and stood by me and said he would walk with me through the dark valley. I felt so happy, and not a bit afraid. I am sure he will be with me when the time comes."

Their eyes were holden that they should not know him. Christ is often near to guide and enlighten when he is not recognized. An old woman in Edinburgh, who was very poor, was in great distress about her rent which was due when she had no funds to meet it. She dreaded the hour when the owner of the house would come to collect. A good friend who knew how poor she was, and suspecting that she might be in need, went to visit her, intending to leave her a gift that would have been enough to pay her rent. He climbed the four flights of stairs that led to her poor room and knocked on the door, but there was no response. The next day he met her on the street and said, "I called on you yesterday to give you this," putting some money in her hand. "but you were not at home." The woman looked gratefully into his face and thanked him. "I wish I had known it was you," she said. "I was at home, and heard your knock, but I thought it was the landlord come for the rent. I did not have it ready so I did not open the door. Oh, what a night of suffering I should have been saved had I known who it was."

In all the Scriptures the things concerning himself. "In the narrow streets of Venice," says Dr. Maclaren, "although the canals are intricate and the passages dark, the traveler need never be lost. There is in the walls beside the canals, and in the pavement of the streets a thin thread of white stone, by following which the traveler will come to the great Piazza, where the church of St. Mark stands." So in all the Bible books, in history, in the law, in poetry, and in prophecy, there is the red line which leads to Christ. He is the central figure which is the focus of them all and to which they point.

Their eyes were opened and they knew him. We have faith to believe that when our spiritual eyes are opened in the next world, and we review the events of life in the clear air of heaven, we shall see that those events which now seem to us unfortunate, were really interpositions of God for our good. History tells us that when the great William of Orange was on his way to the British shores to deliver England from the villainous king, James II., the expedition was delayed by contrary winds. It was impossible to make a landing at the port agreed upon. Finally, in despair the expedition put in at Torbay, the very place where William was not expected, and where no preparations to oppose his landing had been made. Of all parts of the coast, Torbay, to which they were driven against their will, was the one best adapted to secure the success of the enterprise.

SILHOUETTES FROM LIFE

WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BY

Margaret E. Sangster.

"THE WEE BIT VIEW."

For Memorial Day.

"IT'S only a wee bit view I ha'e, but its a bonny one," said my old Scotch friend, cheerfully. She sat beside her window, in her big cushioned chair, her crutches within easy reach, for she was very lame, and hobbled about her four little rooms with great difficulty. "Only a wee bit view, and I am very lame much o' the time, but I get great comfort whiles thinkin' o' the gude hand o' my God."

I went to the window and looked out. I saw the corner of a street, and saw coming around the bend a little procession of children playing soldiers. They had flags and a drum, and their voices sounded pleasantly as they marched by.

"Aunty," I inquired, "how long have you been lame, and unable to go about as I do, and with her people?"

She replied cheerfully: "A matter of thirty years and more, dearie. I took cold soon after the war, when my last laddie came' home to die, and I never got over it. But I don't suffer so very much, and I take great pleasure in my hoose, and my frien's, and my bonny wee bit view."

"It seems a lonesome life. Aunty."

Mrs. MacGregor smiled. She was a Highlander from Inverness, a large-framed, stately woman, with black eyes and coal-black hair, and always she wore a cap with large frills, and a band of black ribbon—the sort of cap her countrywomen call a mutch. On her neck was folded a white handkerchief, and her rusty black dress hung in straight folds. She had very little to live on, but people helped her delicately, and she had only one fear in the world, that of living to be "a burden," and of dying without leaving enough to bury her decently beside the laddies who lay,—six stalwart sons they had been,— asleep in the cemetery. Three of them had died in the war, one had survived it, and died when the peace summer spread its aureoles of beauty over the rejoicing land. Two had since succumbed to disease. The old mother had seen them laid one by one in the plot, which was the only real estate to which she possessed a title-deed. One would have expected her to be gloomy, but no! Aunty MacGregor was as bright as a May morning.

"Lonesome?" she said, in reply to my comment. "I might be, but I find I ha'e plenty to do for others."

Just then there came a tap at the door. A tall young man stood there, with a helpless look on his face, and in his hand a shirt which had met with an accident in the wash.

"The button is off the neck-band, Aunty," he exclaimed piteously, not noticing me, "And look what those wretches have done to this button-hole in the front; it won't hold the stud."

"Give it here, lad," said Aunty, "and hand me my basket from the bureau. I'll put it right for you in a minute."

"I don't know what I'd do if it wasn't for you, Aunty," said the youth.

"All's well with you, Johnny, I hope," said the old lady, as she returned the quickly renovated garment.

"Yes, Aunty; thank you!"

"And you're goin' to join the Christian Endeavor, I'm told, and right glad I am, and sometimes you'll come and gi'e me a bit story o' the meetings, won't you?"

"That I will," said the boy, as he departed with the shirt over his arm.

"Aunty MacGregor," said a little girl, putting her head in at the door, "Mamma wants to know how much ipecac and squills she must give Bobby; he's threatened with the croup."

The requisite dose was mentioned, and the child flew back to her apartment to tell her mother. Aunty's judgment, I found, was relied on implicitly by her neighbors in such emergencies as illness, or burns, or bruises. She kept a little shelf full of remedies — linseed oil, limewater, paregoric, lint, and old linen for bandages, with a wonderful salve of her own making, which had healing properties quite famous in the little neighborhood.

"SHE'LL NOT LET THEM MISS THE FLOWERS ON DECORATION DAY."

While I sat with her, five different people came in on as many errands, and not one was sent empty away. To each was given in turn, aid, counsel, and comfort. As I was ready to take my leave up to the humble door drove a fine equipage, a coachman in livery, two splendid thorough-bred horses; such a carriage as the millionaire's daughter drives about in. Out sprang the child of wealth and luxury, a beautiful golden-haired girl, dressed in the height of fashion, her hands full of violets and lilies of the valley. Aunty MacGregor introduced her young friend with pardonable pride.

"Miss Ruth MacLean, ye'll ken her feyther, na doot. She's aye ready to do some sweet thing for the like o' me!"

"The like o' you, dear old friend," exclaimed the girl, "when I'm not fit to tie your shoes, you're so patient, and I so flighty, and so easily vexed — don't speak that way please, I came to bring you these flowers, and to tell you that to-morrow will be Memorial Day,—ah! you knew it, dear heart, and I'm going to the cemetery to decorate your plot. I'll come first and show you the wreaths and the baskets, and you shall tell me first what to do with each, and where to put them. I'll do it exactly as you'd do it for your own self, if you could go."

"Thank you, my darling," said Aunty MacGregor, with a catch in her voice. "The Lord bless thee and keep thee. The Lord reward thee for thy goodness. The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace."

"Aunty," said the girl, pausing at the door, and returning, "you haven't asked me to sing for you, and for this lady, but I'm going to do it, nevertheless."

The day may be long and late, love,
But the evening time draws on,
There is rest for the worn and weary,
And love for the lonely one.

And the Father's house is waiting,
Its doors will wide unfold,
For the pilgrim who comes with a timid knock,
To the beautiful gates of gold.

She sang like a bird, and then with a swift, bird-like motion, she was away.

"Puir lassie!" said Auntie MacGregor, standing by the aid of her crutches for the wee bit view of her favorite, which the window afforded. "She has her ain troubles; a step-mither, and a fause lover, but she'll win through. And aye I tell her that she mauna marry any man she canna luve with all her heart, and that the right man'll surely come."

"Is she in love, Aunty?" I asked.

"I am not permitted to say," replied Aunty, with reserve, "but from what I've seen, I think she'll be happy yet, the winsome maiden that she is. Bless her; she'll not let my brave laddies miss the flowers on Decoration Day. It's a joy to me, they lying there asleep, with their work all done, that when a May-time comes, the kind hand o' friendship strews the cover-lid above them with the fairest flowers. 'They do rest from their labors.'"

I left Aunty MacGregor, feeling that much of heaven was compressed into the "wee bit view" which was all she would in this life have from her window. After all, it is the spirit we bring to our daily experiences which makes earthly life blessed, or baneful. "Memorial Day" with its flowers, may come oftener than once a year, to those brave soldiers of either sex, of whom it shall one day be said, "They have fought the good fight, they have finished their course, henceforth there is laid up for them a crown of glory that fadeth not away."

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A Plantation Mission.

Progress of the Industrial Experiment in Alabama.

MANY readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are already familiar with the history of the missionary experiment at Beloit, Ala., where 4000 acres of land, purchased by the Industrial Missionary Association of that State, are allotted among a large number of colored families. The plan grew out of the peculiar conditions, religious, industrial and educational, existing on the plantations of that section of Alabama known as the "Black Belt." With no schools, no intelligent native churches and no missionary work, the ignorance and vice of the district were appalling. The system under which the land was worked tended to keep the people constantly poor. Accordingly, philanthropic parties bought large tracts of land, and gave the colored men a chance to acquire small holdings, meanwhile teaching them improved methods of agriculture and other industries. A few years' trial demonstrated the value of the experiment, if the field were widened.

In October, 1888, a number of missionaries of different denominations met at Selma, Ala., and organized the Industrial Missionary Association of Alabama. Plantations were bought and missions planted; the land was divided into small farms, with comfortable homes, and schools and churches were established. Opportunity was given to the holders of these farm homes to acquire the property.

During the next few years, a measure of success followed the efforts of the Missionary Association. Four years ago, a large purchase of additional land was made for the purpose of extending the work. Unfortunately, the cotton crops, during these years, owing to too abundant rains, were considerably under the average, and the finances of the Association were greatly straitened in consequence. Yet all are hopeful. Rev. C. B. Curtis, of Beloit, who has general charge of the work, makes this statement of the situation:

"I am glad to say that we have done more and better mission, school and industrial work, last year, than ever before, and at much less expense. But on our lands, cotton was only one-fourth of the crop. A meeting with the colored people was called last fall to talk over the situation. All were quite hopeful, however, and are determined to take our suggestions to plant less cotton and raise all their home supplies. With but few exceptions, all are working harder than ever, determined, if hard work will succeed, to secure a home for themselves. We have a great many more applications from hard working men, who want to come on our place and buy homes and get good school privileges for their children, than ever before. Applications come not only from Alabama, but from Mississippi, Louisiana, and even from the North; so our industrial outlook, we think, is encouraging; but the greatest problem we have now to consider is the school problem. Last year we had four day schools, with six excellent teachers, besides two night schools, three Sabbath Schools and two churches; but there is absolutely no income from the lands to support them with. Next year's crop is not made, although our farm superintendent reports everything in very fine condition at this date, but within a few months we must engage our teachers, and make provision for the coming year's schools."

Hitherto the work has not been permitted to suffer from lack of support, and the various pastors and helpers who constitute the Missionary Association, believe that means to continue it through the present crisis will not be wanting at the proper time. On the 4000 acres there are at present some sixty families. There are two churches, two night schools, four day schools, three Sabbath Schools, two railway depots, carpenter shop, saw mill, grist mill, cotton gin, blacksmith shop, store and post office. The entire property is valued at $40,000.

THE MORAL OF WHISTLING.

IT is a prevalent notion that a propensity to whistle indicates an indolent or trivial nature. When we are indulging in it by way of soliloquy, and some one meets us, we stop short, snapping the whistle in two, as though we had been doing something disreputable. There if nothing more healthful than this exercise. The faculty has been granted to those of us who cannot sing much. Though we might lose our way in a tune if we attempted the customary soprano or bass, we revel in the sounds which, without any skill, rush with the breath through the contracted lips. Grumblers seldom, if ever, whistle. The art is left only for the blithe and cheerful. Whether it is the whistle that makes the good cheer, or the good cheer that makes the whistle, we have now no time to analyze. This kind of music is an inspiring accompaniment of work. Let two masons be busy on the scaffolding, their strength alike, their hods and trowels alike, the one who whistles will better set the brick and rear the truest wall. Do not rob us of any of our helps. What the world wants is an augmentation of diversion and entertainments; not less skip and romp and curveting, but more. God has no objections to it, or he would not fill the kitten with play, and the lamb with frisk, and the dog with facetious bark, and send the night-wind around the gable with mouth full of whistle. We know not why women, with all their cares, should be denied this exercise, and yet an ungallant rhyme has for ages forbidden it. Do tell us something that women may do? You do not want them to skate, or lecture, or preach, or walk too fast, or laugh very loud, and you finish your long list of prohibitions by saying:

> Whistling girls and crowing hens
> Always come to no good ends.

There are times in a woman's life when a psalm-tune does not seem particularly appropriate, and a carol seems too formidable to attack; the former is too grave and the latter too jubilant, and nothing on earth is consonant with the circumstances but a whistle. That privilege she shall not be denied if we have anything to say about it.

Once, while going on board a steamer, we noticed a little pewter instrument that hung to the boatswain's jacket. On such a simple thing you would not suppose a man could make more than one or two sounds, but that little instrument can play a hundred tunes, and at its call cables, cordage, rigging, sails, colors, boats, and anchor, respond, and all the crew fly swiftly from hammock to capstan, and from capstan to ratline. After eight days of headwind we heard the boatswain's long, keen, resounding whistle. It meant that the wind had changed, and the sails must go up. There was in that pewter whistle more music than in any harp we have since heard, and when it fell down again from the boatswain's lips we re-examined it to see where all that chirrup and glee of sound and shrillness of blast could hide themselves. Thus we sail on in life, and sometimes into the teeth of a headwind, and it is tough navigation. Our whistle, dangling to our neck, seems of no use. Everything is against us; but after awhile there is a change in the moon, and the wind that was adverse, wheels around in our favor. Then we take up our whistle, and, all hands on deck, the sails rise, and the port looms up in the distance. If at such a time we make more noise with our mouth than we ought to, charge it not to us, but charge it to the boatswain's whistle.

BOAT-RACES.

WE are near the season for college boat-racing. We remember being greatly interested, some years ago, as two great English universities contested for the championship in boat-racing. About two hundred thousand young ladies could not sleep at night, so anxious were they to know whether light blue or dark blue would be the winners. The newspapers gave three and four columns to the particulars. The telegraph wires thrilled the victory to all parts of the land. Some of the religious papers condemned the whole affair, enlarging upon the strained wrists, broken blood-vessels, and barbaric animalism of men who ought to have been rowing their race with the Binomial Theorem for one oar, and "Kame's Elements of Criticism" for the other.

For the most part we sympathized with the boys, and confess we kept careful watch of the bulletin, to see whose boat came in ahead. We are disposed to applaud anything that will give our young men muscular development. Students have such a tendency to lounge, and mope, and smoke tobacco at midnight, and read novels after they go to bed, the candlestick set up on the dictionary or the Bible, that we prize anything that makes them cautious about their health, as they must be if they would enter the list of contestants.

How many of our country boys enter college in robust health, which lasts them about a twelvemonth; then they lose their liver; next they lose their stomach; and last they lose their backbone—graduated skeletons, more fitting for an anatomical museum than the bar or pulpit. "Midnight oil," so much eulogized, is the poorest kind of illumination. Where hard study kills one student, bad habits kill a hundred. Kirke White, while at Cambridge, wrote beautiful hymns; but if he had gone to bed at ten o'clock at night, instead of three o'clock the next morning, he would have been of more service to the world, and a healthier example to all collegians. Much of the learning of the day is morbid, and much of the religion bilious. We want, first of all, a clean heart, and next, a strong stomach. Falling from grace is often chargeable to derangement of gastric juice. Oar and bat may become salutary weapons.

But, after all, there are moral perils about these boat-races. A student with a stout arm, and great girth, and full chest, and nothing else, is not at all admirable. Mind and body need to be driven tandem, the body for the wheel horse, and the intellect the leader. We want what is now proposed in some directions, a grand collegiate, literary race. Let the mental contest be on the same week with the muscular. Let there be a Waterloo in classics, belles-lettres and rhetoric, and mathematics and philosophy. Let us see who are the students most worthy to wear the belt. About twelve o'clock at noon, let the literary flotilla start, prow and prow, oar-lock and oar-lock. Let Helicon empty its waters to swell the river of knowledge on which they row. Right foot on rib of the boat, and left foot on the left rib — bend into it, my hearties, bend! — and our craft comes out four lengths ahead.

Give the brain a chance as well as the arm. Do not let the animal eat up the soul. Let the body be the well-fashioned hulk, and the mind the white sails, all hoisted, everything, from flying-jib to spanker, bearing on toward the harbor of glorious achievement. When that boat starts we want to be on the bank to cheer, and after sundown help fill the air with sky-rockets.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Reader, Luton, Ia. In "Manger to Throne" it is mentioned where the Ephesians were burning their books. In those days was it not rolls of parchment that contained all written matter?

Unquestionably, either of parchment, vellum, or some similar material.

W. C. Why were the Children of Israel forbidden to use leaven in the Passover bread?

Leaven consisted generally in Oriental lands of a lump of dough kept until it became sour and acid. It was regarded as a symbol of corruption. Plutarch says that the priests of Jupiter were not allowed to use it, "because it comes out of corruption and corrupts that with which it is mingled." The Passover, being a time of great sanctity, would thus have been profaned by the use of the leaven. (See I. Cor. 5: 8.)

M., New Haven, Conn. Is it right for me to join with any church when I feel that I cannot forgive my enemies, those who have robbed me of both home and friends?

Your is indeed a peculiarly pitiful case, calling for much sympathy, but the Divine injunction to forgiveness is unmistakable. (See Mark 11: 25, 26.) Pray earnestly that your bitterness of heart may pass away and that it may be replaced by forgiveness. Open your heart frankly to your pastor and you will find his counsel of great assistance in leading you to view the matter from the true Christian standpoint.

G. W. Greene, Valparaiso, Neb. When Jesus said (Matt. 11: 14) that John the Baptist was Elias, did he mean that he was really Elijah risen from the dead? Were John and Elias the same person?

No; the meaning is given more clearly in Luke 1: 17, where it is said of John that he should go before him [Christ] in the spirit and power of Elias. In his style of preaching and manner of life John resembled Elijah, and the effect of his work was of the same stirring, awakening character. His message of the duty of repentance was also much like Elijah's.

Inquirer, Fair Haven, Vt. Is faith the only means by which a man may come to knowledge of God and into vital connection with him?

No, not the only means, but the first and indispensable step. If a man does not believe God and trust him he can get no knowledge of him nor make any progress in spiritual life. But after that, God has other means of developing the higher life. Obedience is a great source of enlightenment. He that doeth his will shall know the doctrine. Activity in Christian work, patience in suffering and other things bring a man into knowledge of God and into connection with him.

Reader, Carlisle, Pa. If persons were saved by their works under the Old Testament Dispensation, what need was there for a Saviour? Could not men have been saved now in the same way?

The fact of a Saviour being provided is a sufficient proof that God saw that one was necessary. It would be presumption to criticize his methods. Besides this, as is shown in the Epistle to the Hebrews, especially the eleventh chapter, faith in a coming Saviour was an important element in the salvation of the Old Testament saints. The incarnation was the culmination of God's plan for the redemption of the race, to which the Old Testament types pointed. There was therefore supreme need of a Saviour.

I. H. N., Grand Junction, Colo. What is meant by the injunction Luke 14: 13 to forsake all and follow Christ? Does it mean to leave parents and home to preach the Gospel to the heathen?

It frequently involved that sacrifice at the time the words were spoken. If the time ever comes when the Christian has to choose between filial duty and duty to Christ, the injunction will still apply. It simply means that Christ has the first claim. Preaching to the heathen is not the only way of service, and there are many Christians who are not qualified for it. Very often, duty lies nearer home, in living a consistent Christian life and trying to win souls for Christ among friends and neighbors. Conscience in every case must be the guide.

M. C. Tripoli. Do you think that a person who professes to cure sick people by the power of Jesus Christ and charges patients ten dollars for the cure is really curing them by divine power?

The fact of a charge being made is a reasonable ground for suspicion. We believe that many persons have been cured in answer to prayer. We also believe that many others have been cured purely by the subjective influence of their own faith. In cases of functional (not organic) disease, a strong mental emotion has been known to produce a cure; as in a case where the sufferer had lost the use of her limbs, but recovered the use through fear at finding the room in which she was lying helpless, was on fire. It might be possible to cure some genuine sufferers, by leading them to exercise faith in anything. If they have received religious training, it would of course be the more easy to get them to exercise religious faith and they would really be cured by their own faith, and not by divine power. We do not believe that any person paying money for so-called faith-cure has ever been healed by divine power.

N. H. Stonebrink, Salem, Oreg. Is there any passage in the New Testament that tells the age of Christ at the crucifixion?

From Luke 3: 23 we learn that Jesus was about thirty years old at the beginning of his ministry. After that time the annual feasts of the Jews incidentally mentioned in the Gospels indicate that three years elapsed before the crucifixion. If Jesus was born in December he would be according to this mode of reckoning thirty-three years and three or four months old when he died.

E. M. P., Va., and many others. Does the apostolic prohibition of women speaking in the church (1. Cor. 14: 34), apply to Christian Endeavor and other young people's meetings?

Decidedly not. The whole situation is different from that existing at Corinth and other European cities where Paul preached and wrote. The expressions referred to as well as those in other epistles were called forth by the peculiar social conditions of the time. It would have caused a grave scandal and have excited a strong prejudice against the infant church for women to have taken a prominent part in the services. Beside this, there were abuses which at Corinth were already causing trouble and which could be remedied only by the prohibition. A literal obedience to the injunction would prevent a woman singing in church or teaching a class in the Sunday School.

Old Subscriber. Is it right for the Bible Society or Mission Boards to accept money left them in the will of a brewer?

It is a fair presumption, when an individual bequeaths money to be used for a religious purpose, after his death, that he does so from a worthy and conscientious motive. It may even be that he does it to amend, in some degree, what he may have neglected in his lifetime. While bequests of this character may not be regarded as equally sacred with those lovingly made by persons who during life have served the Lord, still it would seem to be wrong if not somewhat pharisaical, to spurn such offerings, unless the evidence were very clear and positive that they were of a character unfit for acceptance. Some of the grandest philanthropies have been based on gifts made in the repentant close of worldly lives.

F. C. N., Evessley, Can. Would it be wrong for a preacher, in preparing or delivering a sermon, to use the thoughts and suggestions of others without mentioning where he got them—if he is preaching for the saving of souls?

Ideas are not patentable and cannot be copyrighted unless framed in words or otherwise visibly expressed. To use the language of another in the pulpit would be plagiarism. The proper method, in such cases, is to quote your authority or source of information. You are then at liberty to repeat the language of the original or to clothe it with a form of your own construction. If, before speaking on a subject you diligently read and study what others have written concerning it, and consult such sources of information as are available, you will soon find little difficulty in placing the matter attractively before others in your own natural form of expression.

C. C. Smith, Twin Mound, Kans. 1. What will be the condition of religion in the world after the period mentioned (Matt. 24: 40, 41) when one is taken and another left? 2. Is science still at issue with Genesis as to the days of creation?

1. Among the Christians that are left, we may expect there will be a revival. The worldliness and indifference, which will cause the to be left behind, will give place to an intense desire for spiritual attainment. The description given of the persecution by Antichrist implies that there will be many Christians in the word at that time so much in earnest as to be ready to lose property, and even life itself rather than be unfaithful to Christ. 2. Science is at issue with the interpretation of Genesis which makes the six days six natural days of twenty-four hours. It is substantially in accord with the sequence given in Genesis, but contends that each stage occupied thousands or millions of years instead of any ordinary day.

Reader, City Island, N. Y. I find a list of names of patrons of the Bowery Mission in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of April 13th. Will you kindly tell me something about it? I would like to help a little. I am more interested in the young men and boys, as I have five of my own.

The Bowery Mission was established over fourteen years ago, for the reclamation of a multitude of lost men and boys on the East side of New York. Its converts are found all over the world. It has already done a great work for Christ and humanity. In April of this year, when it seemed about to be abandoned, the burden of sustaining and continuing the work was undertaken by Dr. Klopsch, proprietor of this paper. The names of patrons that appear from week to week in these columns are sent us by Christian men and women who desire to be associated spiritually with the work and who promise to make a contribution towards the Mission's support once a year.

M. S. B. Matter is indestructible. Cremation only operates to produce a chemical change in the body, resolving it into gases. Compared with the omniscience of the Great Chemist of the universe, man's knowledge of science is a very little thing. —— M., Medford, Oreg. If duty calls him there, he is proper, otherwise not. He would be doubly a wrongdoer if he went to such a place for pleasure.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

TEASURES FROM THE TOMB.

ONE of the richest discoveries of modern times has been made in Egypt at Dashur by M. de Morgan, Director of excavations in the Egyptian government service. It consists of a large number of jewels and ornaments of exquisite workmanship. They were found in the tomb of an ancient Egyptian princess who they had been interred with her mummy. That they had so long escaped the predations of the people around, was due in part to the stability of the tomb, which was constructed of immense blocks of limestone dovetailed together with marvelous skill and nicety. Even had the builders suspected the value of the treasure concealed under the stones, which they did not, they possessed no means of getting at it. M. de Morgan, with his modern apparatus, was the first to disturb the stones which had been piled over the tomb centuries ago and bring its sparkling contents to light. A picture on this page represents some of the most remarkable of the treasures. One is a coronet of extremely delicate workmanship. It has sixteen medallions of gold encrusted with precious stones, each medallion linked to the others by a lacework of fine gold thread on which forget-me-nots are strung. A golden cylinder in the centre was fixed to hold the plume, which consisted of a beautiful model of a slender tree with gold branches and leaves and sparkling with precious stones representing fruits. It is in perfect preservation and indicates a skill and delicacy in manufacture unsurpassed by any jewelry of this day. Another treasure is a bronze dagger the handle of which is of gold tipped with lapis lazuli and richly adorned with jewels. A waist band of exquisite workmanship of gold and lapis with gems was also found in the tomb with numerous necklaces and rings. In the dust were found a number of delicate ornaments such as vultures and hawks' heads in gold with eyes of garnet, golden claws set in gold and other ornaments of an emblematic design. Evidently the princess, who had been buried with all these treasures, had been one of illustrious birth and of enormous wealth. No motive for putting articles of such value and such artistic beauty in a tomb is suggested but one based on the belief in a future life. It would have been supposed that the princess would some day rise to a new life and again adorn herself with her jewels. If that generation were still entertained, many women of these days would want to be buried like the ancient Egyptian princess, with their jewels around them, for the love of ornaments has not diminished. It is a pity that it does not prompt them to strive after the possession of the ornament that does survive death and has God's approval.

"Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price. 1. Peter 3: 3, 4.)

The Holy Name on Mars.

An astronomer at Washington D. C. has communicated to the New York Herald" an interesting discovery. It is the fact that on the surface of the planet Mars, spelled in Hebrew characters, is the name of God. For several years past, the attention of astronomers has been concentrated on Mars. All that could be learned about the planet from the telescope and the spectroscope, indicated a closer resemblance to our world than was borne by any other planet. There was consequently a strong probability that if any planet is inhabited by beings like ourselves, it is Mars. The suggestion was made that the question whether being inhabitants on the planet, could be tested by a signal. It was thought that if some geometrical figure were traced on the earth's surface, by lights on a dark background, it might be visible to people on Mars, if there were any there, and that if they were people as intelligent as ourselves, they would understand that it was a signal, and respond by giving a similar signal. While the suggestion was being discussed, there suddenly blazed out on the surface of Mars three bright lights equidistant from each other, marking the points of an equilateral triangle. Was this a signal? Had the people on Mars anticipated us? No one knew, and no attempt was made to respond. But the study of the planet was continued. The Italian astronomer Schiaparelli announced that the dark straight lines which run across the surface of Mars like network were doubled. He said that through his telescope he could see a second line running parallel to the original lines, and he propounded the theory that they were gigantic canals. The new lines, he thought, were duplicate canals, which were filled only in the spring of the planet's season, when the great ice-cap at the Martian pole melted under the rays of the sun. Still closer attention has been given to the lines since that theory was broached, and now comes the discovery which has been made by the Washington astronomer. In studying the map of Mars, which was made for Lowell's Boston lecture, he noticed a peculiar conformation of the dark lines. It was that the lines in one place were the exact shape of the Hebrew letters, "Daleth and Yodh." Before the Daleth there was another dark mark on the map. It was a mere fragment on the edge of the hemisphere. The observer was curious to see if that too was like a Hebrew letter. He made a Mercator's projection of the planet, from which he could see the remainder of the fragment. It was the Hebrew letter, "Sheen." The three letters form the Hebrew name of God. There is no question about the resemblance. The map shows it distinctly. Whether it is an accidental and natural conformation, or has been cut by design, as a signal, there is no means of determining at present. The latter possibility will, however, give new zest to the study of the planet, which, even if it leads to the theory of design being abandoned, will assuredly bring to light proofs of the power and wisdom of God. In whatever direction exploration is made, there, as the Hebrew prophet said long ago:

The man of wisdom will see thy name. (Micah 6:9.)

A Panic in a Menagerie.

One of the attendants at a circus recently exhibiting in Brooklyn, N. Y., describes a panic which took place in the menagerie during a Western trip. The spectators had left the tents one evening, and there was no one around but the night watchman, when suddenly one of the largest elephants began trumpeting loudly. The other animals set up a responsive roar which seemed as if it would rend the very tent. The attendants came running in from the sleeping quarters wondering what had occurred. They found the elephant wildly waving his trunk in the air in a paroxysm of alarm, and the other animals in a state of dangerous excitement. The cause of the trouble was discovered in the ejection of a tiny mouse from the elephant's trunk. There is something very ludicrous in so small a creature frightening one so large and powerful; but fear even in men is sometimes produced by insignificant causes. It is well known that wicked and brutal men are often scared by their own superstitious credulity. Such a timorous state of mind is one of the punishments with which God threatens those reckless men who break his laws.

I will send a faintness into their hearts, and the sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them, and they shall flee when none pursueth. (Levit. 26: 36.)

A Medical Martyr.

Science has lost an able investigator by the death of Dr. J. M. Byron of New York. The circumstances of his death are very pathetic. He knew in March of last year that he was a doomed man. He detected in himself symptoms of disease, and although he adopted every means known to medical science to extirpate it he never had any hope of escaping the fate that has befallen him. He was the director of the Bacteriological Department of the Loomis Laboratory, and he was much interested in the study of the germs of pulmonary disease. He experimented on these germs, which he kept in glass tubes, removing them at various stages to the slides of his microscope for examination. The object, of course, was to discover some means of annihilating the germs when they were in the lungs of living patients. He was aware of the danger he incurred in making his investigations, and he was careful to keep the germs moist, so that he might not inhale them. But in February of last year he had a period of overwork and neglected his usual precautions. Some of the germs must have become dry and floated into the air of the laboratory. In a month's time he realized that they had found a lodgement in his lungs and had begun their fatal work. It is very sad that a man of so much promise, who was striving to discover the means of saving others from consumption, should have fallen a victim to the disease. We count him a martyr, and hold him in honor for the service that he tried to render. Had he succeeded, his name would have been reverenced the world over, and every consumptive would have eagerly sought his remedy. Yet those who are afflicted with the more terrible malady of sin, which causes eternal death, cannot be induced to seek the sure remedy which Christ gave his life to provide.

That through death he might destroy him that had the power of death. (Heb. 2: 14.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Some of our Friends Have Written us that they did not hear of the offer made in this column on May 8 in time to take advantage of it. In response to their request, we have consented to extend the time until June 15. On receipt of one dollar at this office at any time before June 15, we will send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD every week until Jan. 1, 1896, with back numbers from May 1, to any person not previously a subscriber, and also to any subscriber sending us the name of such person with the dollar, we will send any one of our three beautiful premiums: "The Pathway of Life," "From Manger to Throne," or "Gospel Hymns, 1 to 6." The object of this extraordinary offer is to introduce the paper into homes where it is not now taken. A new name sent merely as a substitute for the name of a subscriber whose term is about to expire, will not entitle the sender to the advantages of the offer.

The Statement is made on apparently good authority that in Belgium 200,000 people die annually out of a total population of between five and a half and six millions, as the result of the use of intoxicating liquors.

The Polyglot Petition Against Drink and opium, which now contains seven and a half million signatures, will be presented to the British Government in June. The signatures have been mounted on a strip of canvas over a mile in length.

The First Presbyterian Church of Chicago received into full communion five Chinamen on May 5. In order that the service might be better understood by their associates the service was held at four o'clock, immediately following the Chinese Sunday School.

The work of laying the Foundation of the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine, in New York, has been begun. Considerable difficulty has been experienced in finding a suitable rock bottom to carry the immense weight of the stupendous structure to be erected.

Messrs. Weaver Brothers and their Venerable father, Richard Weaver, addressed very large meetings at Leith, close to Edinburgh, during two weeks in April. A large number of people came forward to shake hands with the aged evangelist, and to say that he was the means of their conversion twenty or thirty years ago.

The Action of Archbishop Plunkett in consecrating Cabrera a Protestant bishop in Spain, has aroused a strong feeling of condemnation from the Ritual clergy of Great Britain. The Archbishop has, on the other hand, received messages of cordial approval from the Irish clergy. Comparatively few can be found in Ireland who disapprove of it.

The American School of Christian Philosophy will hold its second summer session at Chautauqua, July 2-9. Among the principal speakers and lecturers will be Prof. Austin Abbott, Dr. Josiah Strong, Prof. Francis G. Peabody, Dr. George Dana Boardman, Chancellor McCracken, Dr. Edward Everett Hale, Gen. J. B. Gordon, Prof. A. S. Cook of Yale, and G. Stanley Hall of Clark University.

Mayor Cole's Services at Denison, Tex., have been the means of an extensive revival. The pastors of the Methodist, Baptist, Congregational, and Presbyterian Churchs co-operated with the Evangelist. The morning meetings were held in the churches in turn and the evening meetings in a large tent at an accessible place. Each church has received an accession of members from the services.

Mr. Stevenson, of the China Inland Mission, writes that the Empress Dowager of China has sent valuable presents to the twenty missionary women who arranged for the gift to her of the New Testament. It is said that this Testament is really being read in the palace. Dr. Hudson Taylor reports that since the outbreak of the war all foreign missionaries have been scrupulously protected by the Chinese Government.

At The Seventieth Anniversary of The American Tract Society celebrated in New York recently, it was stated that 128 new publications had been sent out during the year, including sixty-six issued at foreign mission stations, one-third of which were in the vernacular of the respective countries. During the seventy years of its existence, the Society has issued, exclusive of periodicals, 12,820 publications, of which 4,825 were in the foreign field.

The Seventh Annual Sea Side Bible Conference conducted by Dr. L. W. Munhall will be held in Educational Hall, Asbury Park, N. J., July 19–29. Among the clergymen who have promised to attend and take part are Drs. James H. Brookes, Arthur T. Pierson, Wm. J. and Albert Erdman and S. L. Baldwin; Professors' Wm. G. Moorehead, James M. Stifler and Ernest F. Stroeter, A. C. Dixon, D. M. Stearns and Wm E. Needham; and Evangelists Major Whittle and Thomas Needham.

A Church Built by Prayer.

How a Band of Godly Men and Women Reared a Temple to the Lord.

UNTIL a few days ago, a congregation of Christian worshippers in Brooklyn, formerly connected with the Ocean Hill Baptist Church in that city, had been for a whole year practically without a church home. With their pastor, Rev. Watson J. Mosier, they had left the Ocean Hill Church for the reason that Mr. Mosier—who had a salary of two thousand dollars a year and a free parsonage—had declined any longer to accept wages for his labors in the Lord's vineyard. He declared that he could find no Scriptural justification for receiving pay for preaching the Gospel, and accordingly, with a number of his adherents, who supported him in this view, he left the church. Soon the decision was reached that a new church must be built for the little flock, and while search was made for a site and funds were being raised, services were held in an empty store, with a sewing-machine covered with a table-cloth as Pastor Mosier's pulpit. Mrs. Abel, a member of the congregation, bought three lots on Bainbridge street, valued at $5,400, and presented them to the church as a site, with the stipulation that the building to be erected should always be free, and that no fairs or similar entertainments should ever desecrate it.

Nearly a year has passed since the foundation stone of the new church was laid. The worshippers themselves dug the trenches with their own hands, although many of them had probably never handled a pick or spade before. It was on a moonlight night that ground was broken, and among those who were present and prepared to assist were several clergymen, who were in full brotherly sympathy with Mr. Mosier. In the open lot, the organist played jubilant hymns in which all joined with hearty voices. Then old men and young, with pick and shovel, worked vigorously, and the ladies of the congregation supplied them with lemonade and sandwiches. For weeks the excavating was continued on nights when the weather was pleasant, and the workers did not become discouraged. At last the foundation was ready and the masons, carpenters, plumbers, gas-fitters and roofers then came in, to supplement the voluntary work with their skilled labor. All the tradesmen were paid at the regular current rates, and the building began to grow apace, halting only when the funds were exhausted—a circumstance which was of frequent occurrence.

But Pastor Mosier's faithful flock were resolved to go on. Their faith in God was unshaken. Every month, each member set aside what could be spared for the building fund, and as soon as the amount was of available proportions, work on the church was resumed. Several times the bricklayers were forced to stop for the lack of bricks, and on such occasions a special prayer-meeting would be called when the trouble would be laid before the Lord. Invariably the funds came and brick was supplied. And thus the struggle went on for several months.

Presently the outside public began to be interested in the remarkable efforts being put forth by the faithful little congregation, and as the interest grew, sympathetic offerings flowed in from various quarters. Yet the members did not in the slightest degree, relax their own efforts. All had given, many of them to the limit of their resources. On several occasions, when owing to the lack of funds, the work had halted for a week or more, the little flock would hold a season of self-denial, and by fasting and stripping themselves of all luxuries, they would soon gather enough money to purchase a new supply of bricks. Thus the little church was literally built in sections. When the front and a portion of the side walls were partially finished, the space left for the rear wall was filled with light boarding. Against this was set the temporary pulpit. Inch by inch and foot by foot, as the money came in, the brick side walls were extended and the frail wooden partition was set further backward and the pulpit with it. From being a mere shallow section, wide enough to accommodate only half a dozen chairs across, the auditorium is gradually extending in depth as the building progresses.

A week ago the unfinished church was dedicated. When the joyful congregation assembled, they looked around upon the unplastered walls, unpainted balconies and pillows of yellow pine that still showed the natural hue of the wood. From the laths on the walls were hung a number of Scriptural texts and pictures, and on a curtain behind the pulpit, and also on the walls beneath the galleries were red-and-white lettered mottoes, painted by the loving hands of the congregation. But it was just as happy a gathering as though the interior and exterior of the little church had been as richly and expensively ornamented as any grand catheral. They felt that it had come to them in answer to their prayers, and that the Lord himself had blessed their humble efforts and would continue to prosper them. So to show their pleasure, they loaded the platform with flowers, that dedication night. There were no pews, but the plain wooden chairs were quite comfortable, and the pair of oil lamps that would have been considered absurd anywhere else, shed enough radiance to lighten up the happy faces.

All the speakers at the dedication referred to the struggle through which the church was passing. They were glad it had begun in a small way; it was healthiest when poor, because then it had to depend entirely upon the Lord. They were glad the walls were unplastered; glad the church had not depended upon the ordinary methods to raise money which they regarded as unScriptural; glad, above all, that the King's Treasury had supplied and would always supply the funds for a good cause.

THE SWELLING OF JORDAN.

"If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou contend with horses? And if in the land of peace wherein thou trustedst, they wearied thee, then how wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan." Jer. 12: 5.

OH, never lose courage, my brother,
Nor faint ere thy journey shall end.
For if thou art wearied by footmen, brother,
How wilt thou with horses contend?

Chorus:

Get ready in time, for the swelling of Jordan,
With life's opportunities near;
Or how wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan
When thou shalt in judgment appear?

And if thou art wearied, my brother,
And vexed in a country of peace,
How wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan,
When quiet and comfort shall cease?

If trials of earth shall oppose thee,
And sorrows thy soul shall benumb;
How wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan,
When things of eternity come?

Choose Christ for your portion, my brother,
You need him, you need him to-day—
You surely will need him when Jordan is swelling
Oh choose him forever and aye

OUR BOOK SHELF.

A GIANT OF DICTIONARIES.*

EVEN in this age of dictionary-making, when the products of the lexicographer's labors are rapidly assuming a shape that may literally be described as formidable and exhaustive, it is a matter of surprise to know that the far-reaching art—in which Dr. Johnson's modest two-volume compilation issued 140 years ago, was the illustrious pioneer—has possibilities beyond those yet disclosed. The best evidence of this fact is at hand in "The Encyclopædic Dictionary," which has just been issued in four handsome volumes by The Syndicate Publishing Company, Philadelphia. This new Dictionary, in point of comprehensiveness, may fairly challenge comparison with any of the great dictionaries now in the field. It is an English work, and its preparation was the task of seventeen years. The original edition was issued by the famous English house of Cassell & Co., who engaged in its preparation a very large staff of distinguished scholars and eminent scientists, all organized under the general editorial supervision of Prof. Robert Hunter, A. M., F. G. S., assisted by Prof. John A. Williams, of Oxford University, Profs. Heritage and Estoclet. A corps of famous specialists in Astronomy, Physiology, Chemistry, Mineralogy, Music, Botany, Palæontology, and Zoology, and a very large number of other learned men, including presidents and members of scientific and other societies, officers of religious bodies, university professors, government officials, and private experts in Europe and America were also among those who contributed to "The Encyclopædic Dictionary."

Turning to the work itself, one is impressed with the tremendous amount of patient labor and research that has been expended upon it, no less than with the richness and magnificent variety of the result. Being Dictionary and Encyclopædia combined, its utility and convenience are far more likely to be appreciated than if the encyclopedic features had been omitted. Claiming to contain every word in the English language, it presents not only their meaning, but a full account of their origin, pronunciation, history, and use. It is essentially a work for the scholar and the student; yet its price will put it within the reach of very many who will consider it a boon to be able to secure so complete a work for their libraries. The letter-press is made still more attractive by copious illustrations. Each volume averages 1340 pages, and the entire dictionary registers 250,000 words, including compounds. It is so simply, yet effectively arranged that its wealth of information is more readily available than that of most of the modern dictionaries. Containing all the usual dictionary features, it supplements a vast amount of encyclopædic information on science, history, &c., so classified and set for as to make the four great volumes serve the purpose of a complete reference library.

It is, of course, impossible in the limits of a brief review, to do more than indicate a few of the principal features in a work of this comprehensive character. The system of clear diacritical marks and key makes it impossible to mistake the pronunciation it gives. Eminent professors, teachers and divines give it a foremost position as a work of reference, and as a literary work it should be highly valued anywhere. The present edition is thoroughly American and under the direction of Professor Morris of Philadelphia, whose distinguished scholarship and great experience as a lexicographer are sufficient guarantee of the thoroughness of the revision, and of the full recognition accorded to American science, inventions and phrases in "The Encyclopædic Dictionary."

*"The Encyclopædic Dictionary," in four volumes, handsomely cloth binding, copiously illustrated, and with full appendices; 1,340 quarto pages; price $7.50 till June 25. The Syndicate Publishing Co., No. 234 So. Eighth street, Philadelphia, publishers.

MONUMENTS OF FRANCE.‡

No one who has traveled in France and visited the cathedrals, the chateaux, and the walled towns, can fail to be deeply impressed by the meaning of the two words, "historical monument." A "monument historique" in France means a church, or a castle, or a town that has been thought worthy either of restoration or preservation at the expense of the French people. There is a tax levied to provide the money necessary for these purposes, and it is astonishing how much the French are willing to pay to preserve or restore whatever has to do with their history as a nation. The money required is by no means a small sum.

There is a lesson to be learned here for the enlightenment of the French people of the present day, and there is another lesson to be learned, by way of contrast, in looking back to the French Revolution, and realizing that no social convulsion the world has ever seen destroyed so many relics of the past as did that one. Not even the iconoclasts of Cromwell were so unsparing in wanton destruction. It seems as though the French of to-day were trying to make amends for the fearful excesses of ones who were goaded to madness by the tyranny of king after king, culminating in the frightful contrast between the luxury of Louis XIV's court and the misery of the people. The fury past, calmness regained, free government assured, the people learn as precious things all that remains in visible form to tell of their ancient history.

It is not only those connected with the government who feel in this way. The common people are in full sympathy with this feeling. It would be well if the American people would take care of such historical monuments as they have in the same way as is the custom now in France.

Bible-Women in Japan.

Their Work in the Camps, Barracks, nd Hospitals, Described by an Amer-an Lady Missionary.

IN a letter from Hiroshima to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Miss H. M. Browne sends this cheering description of the progress of Gospel work among the Japanese soldiers:

"During the time the Sond division was in Hiroshima, one paching place was kept open eight days, al another twenty days, for the special b efit of the soldiers, from three tsix o'clock in the afternoon. At the former place, three Bible-ymen and myself did what we c ld in the Sabbath forenoon. I was a hotel of two large rms; and conversation was oned with the group in each rm, and in the back room kt up for several hours. Among the listeners were two vo seemed especially in earn-es; but not till some days later d we know how the Lord had oned their hearts. On the flowing Tuesday one of them f senseless on the main street d Hiroshima, and when the po-liman picked him up, he found nthing on his person by which t identify him but the card of th evangelist. When the evan-gist was called, he could not t where he had met him, but fing it was at one of the paching places, went there a found that the man was the yinger brother of the landlord.

The family were very grate-fto the Christians for finding hi and bringing him home, al to the woman who visited hi nearly every day during the th weeks that he lived. He ner became able to talk, more thn to say, 'Thanks and praise t God, thanks and praise to Gd,' and to show his delight a he Bible-women's visits and th talk of Christ. The family a glad that he died a Chris-th, and seem more than half psuaded themselves, in spite of th opposition from all around.

At the other preaching place, al, the women of the fam-il continue their interest up to th present time, and ask the Ble-women to continue visit-il them. At this place, during th twenty days, there were eht soldiers who seemed to get hd of enough of the truth to g to China with a new hope. Any of them stayed with the engelist till twelve o'clock a night for a last teaching, tugh they had to start at four th next morning. A young an, too, residing in Hiroshi-a, was brought to Christ.

"Two of us distributed tracts t the coolies in two of the tem-ls. One tract was taken by a an who became deeply inter-ed, and he took it to an engelist, with ten marked ces which he did not fully derstand, and inquired more fly of him. On my second or rd visit to one of the wards f the Second Branch Hospital, rteen men asked for New staments, some saying, 'Be re to send them before we ve the hospital to-morrow af-noon.' On my next call at this ward, ee more were asked for. I told the men at I could not give them New Testaments be soon cast aside. But they all insisted at they really wished to study and use em.

"We can hardly count the invitations come again that we have had from pa-nts and nurses. One patient, who at st did not care to receive a tract even, ked me for something that would explain e truth, for he wanted to examine into it. hristian talk in that ward seems to have come as common as the news of the day. he man so in earnest has gotten two ends who visited him to study the Bible, d says, 'I must go home soon and get the people of my village to believe.' On my remarking that he must become well grounded himself first, he replied, rather astonished, 'Why, it will never do for me to believe this alone. I must tell them.'"

A CURIOUS INTERRUPTION.

In the life of John Horden, missionary Bishop to the Hudson Bay Indians, the following anecdote is related: Soon after his return as a bishop, a curious interruption stopped for a moment one of his services. He had been up the bay, when, during the journey, he saw a body of Indians in the distance. As usual, he at once arranged a service for them. A good many young people were present, to whom the bishop spoke. Suddenly there was a stir amongst the hearers, and cries were raised. He stopped for a moment in astonishment; but then their voices told him the cause of the tumult. The mothers were making the most of his advice. "Do you hear?" they cried to their daughters; "isn't this what we are always telling you?"

"Then the daughters were hauled to the front, whilst their mothers shouted: "Come here, that he may see you; let him see how ashamed you look, you disobedient children." This interlude over, the sermon went on to a happy end. Bishop Horden had for years been training some natives, with a view to the ministry, and two were speedily ordained by him.

PROPHECY AS A GUIDE.

An Important part of the Bible given for the Definite Purpose of Warning.

BY REV. RICHARD CHESTER.

BESIDES the evidence of the necessity for the study of prophecy as such, and the examples of the utility, and the warnings as to its neglect, with which we are confronted in the Old Testament, we have all these enforced by strong and direct reproof, and by emphatic injunction, in the New Testament. The journey of the two disciples to Emmaus is one with which we are all familiar—how their minds were troubled by the, to them, unexpected death of him whom they had trusted would have been the Redeemer of Israel—and how the Lord himself, meeting them upon their way, and entering into converse with them accounted for all this unbelief, and the ignorance in which it originated, in these memorable words: "Oh, fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken." Had these disciples made themselves familiar with the prophets—neither his crucifixion nor his resurrection could have for one moment shaken their faith in him as their Messiah, or taken them in the least degree by surprise. On the contrary, these events, fulfilling at once these prophecies, and the expectations which they had founded upon them, would have immeasurably increased their faith and filled their hearts with overflowing peace and joy.

Is there not in all this a very solemn warning to us, lest similar folly and slowness of heart, and consequent ignorance and unbelief with regard to what these same prophets have spoken concerning his second advent should cause it, and the events connected with it, in like manner to take us by surprise, and to involve us in sadness and perplexity, at the very time when we ought to be "glad before his presence with exceeding joy"—and should bring upon us, as in such case far more inexcusable than they were, proportionably more of stern and overwhelming rebuke?

Is it not marvellous almost beyond belief that, in the face of examples, warnings, rebukes, and injunctions such as these, recorded in the Holy Scriptures for our instruction—all of them proceeding from the Spirit, and several of them from the lips of the Lord Jesus Christ himself—any of those who profess and call themselves Christians, much more any of those who have taken upon themselves the awfully solemn responsibility of ministers of the Word, can continue in habitual neglect, and therefore in wilful ignorance, of the prophecies which "Holy men of God have spoken as they were moved by the Holy Ghost?"

If many of the current interpretations of prophecy be, as they unquestionably are, such as must seem to men of sound practical common sense altogether figurative and fanciful, and therefore vague and uncertain—and this, moreover, after making all due allowance for the figurativeness and symbolism of Eastern language, we can understand how a feeling of repulsion not easily to be overcome may spring up in the minds of such persons against a subject thus objectionably presented to them. That the dislike ought in such case to be restricted to the mode of interpretation, and should not extend to that which it seeks to interpret, is true, and ought never to be lost sight of, must be evident to every one who is unprejudiced. I speak, of course, to those who believe the Bible to be the message of God to man, and I ask them solemnly, why the prophecies were incorporated in the Book if not for a guide and a warning.

HOW TO STUDY THE BIBLE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing June 9. Joshua 1: 1-9.

IF the Bible were studied in the manner and for the purpose prescribed to Joshua for the study of the law, the Book would cease to be so uninteresting as it so often is, and the study would be more profitable. It is astonishing how many people seem to get nothing from it but speculative problems. They want to know where Cain found a wife, what was the name of David's mother, how the sun could have lengthened the day by standing still, and a host of other things that would be of no practical benefit to them if they could be known, while they fail to grasp, and incorporate in their lives, the principles that would transform them. The instructions to Joshua were to meditate on the law, that he might observe to do according to all that was written therein. One of the most convincing proofs of the divine origin of the Book is the fact that so many centuries after it was written, and in circumstances so utterly different from any that were known to the writers, it may be profitably studied for the same purpose. The father concerned for the welfare of his child, anxious that he should escape the snares and pitfalls of city life, desirous that he should become an honest, virtuous, useful man, can adopt no better means of attaining those objects than to get him to study and obey the precepts of that old Book. Human nature has not changed in the centuries. It may have become more polished, more refined, more cultivated, but it is the same nature, and its dangers are the same, although approaching in new forms. The old enemy that assailed Samson, and Esau, and Jacob, and Solomon, attacks every man, and in the story of their lives lessons are taught that apply to every life. The God who made man and called him to become a living soul, to rise out of the animal life into the spiritual being, has used the men who wrote this Book to map out the road to eternal life. That they were fallible men we know by their biographies, but they wrote the truth as God revealed it to them, and their words are instinct with divine life. Men in these days are very proud of discovering errors in the Bible, of overturning old ideas as to date and authorship. They are welcome to all the credit that is their due. We are no more concerned about the authorship of the various books than we are concerned about the name of the clerk who transcribes the telegram that is a message from a distant friend. The life that is in the Bible and that invigorates every soul that makes it a guide, is a sufficient evidence of its origin. It comes from God, whatever the channel may have been by which it has reached us. That the human element of the writers should be perceptible in its pages was inevitable. It was necessary to our understanding of the Divine message that it should come through human fingers, as pure gold has to be alloyed before it can be worked. But the divine principles are there, and he who studies the Book that he may learn how to live, will find there all he needs to make his life pure and beneficent in the world.

THE COMING E. L. CONFERENCE.

A circular from Epworth League headquarters outlines the programme of the Conference at Chattanooga, Tenn., June 2[illegible]. The quarters of the Conference are to be [illegible] a huge tent, capable of accommodating 10,000 persons, Mr. Rowland D. Williams has organized a choir of five hundred voices, and a thousand children will form a supplementary choir. Besides these there will be an orchestra of thirty-six pieces led by the Park Sisters, the famous cornetists, so that the musical part of the programme is in excellent shape.

The topics to be discussed are grouped under the general head of "The Methodism of the Future." They include "Life in the Local Church" with the duties intellectual, official and social; Philanthropic Work" and "Methodism in Doctrine and Spirit." There will be a great Love Feast conducted by Bishop O. P. Fitzgerald, President of the League; Sunrise Prayer-meetings on Lookout Mountain; a Watch-night Service and a grand Consecration meeting.

THREE C. E. LEADERS.

Among the officers of a Christian Endeavor Society the President is apt to get the place of honor and the Secretary finds his office to be the place of work. The Christ-like spirit generally prevents any envy in these matters, for the members do not forget the principle, "in honor preferring one another." It is, besides, a pleasure to be useful and it is in service not in honor that one may best follow Christ. But there is no reason why the hardworking officials should be overlooked and therefore we introduce to our readers in this issue three holders of that office.

THREE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR SECRETARIES.

REV. E. LEE FLECK. MISS F. RICA STRAEFER. MR. JOHN E. SLEMAN.

Rev. E. Lee Fleck is the Secretary of the National Christian Endeavor Union of the Lutheran Church. He is pastor of the Second Lutheran Church of Dayton, O. and is an active worker in Sunday School, Young Men's Christian Association and Christian Endeavor fields. At the Cleveland Convention he was chairman of the Lutheran Rally and when the Lutheran Societies decided to organize on denominational lines instead of geographical lines, Mr. Fleck was elected Secretary. This office he has filled with credit to himself and with satisfaction to the societies. Mr. Fleck is thirty-nine years of age and has led an active life as home missionary in Nebraska, in Springfield, O. and latterly as pastor of the Dayton Church which under his charge has developed from a small mission to a church of 100 members.

Miss F. Rica Straefer is Secretary of the Kentucky Christian Endeavor Union. She is a native of Ohio, but has spent the greater part of her life in Kentucky. She has been a member of the Presybterian Church of Bellevue since her sixteenth year, and has taken a deep interest in Sunday School work. From an early period in the Christian Endeavor movement, Miss Straefer has given it active service in her State. Mainly through her efforts three new Christian Endeavor Societies were organized, and she has recently formed a junior society in her own church. She has already served one term as Secretary of the State Union, and her efficiency she displayed in the discharge of the duties was acknowledged in her election for a second term.

Mr. John B. Sleman, the third member of the trio, is the Recording Secretary of the Washington Union of Christian Endeavor Societies. He is a law student in the Columbian University. Though only in his twenty-first year, Mr. Sleman has been an active endeavorer for five years and has taken a prominent part in the city organizations. He wields a vigorous pen and has for some time been Manager and Editor of the local Endeavor newspaper. He was leader of the forces in the campaign to secure the National Convention for Washington in 1896. Mr. Sleman's untiring energy and strong faith in Christian Endeavor principles marks him out for a prominent place in the organization in the National Capital.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Delegates from Detroit, Mich., and the neighborhood to the Epworth League Conference at Chattanooga, Tenn. will be so numerous that a solid train is to be run specially for them.

A significant feature in the decorations of the hall for the National Convention of the B. Y. P. U. at Baltimore will be the insignia of every nation in which Baptists are doing missionary work.

The Epworth league at Centre Church, Malden, Mass., sustains one Sunday School and two prayer meetings in neighborhoods where there is a dearth of evangelical effort and where they are doing much good.

A single sailor, converted early this year at a meeting of the Floating Christian Endeavor work of the San Francisco societies, sailed for Tacoma on the British ship "Glencona," and on the way, in spite of opposition, won seven souls for his Master.

A very successful district rally of the Baptist Young People's Union was held recently at Loup City, Neb. Among the speakers were Rev. A. W. Clark, of Omaha; B. F. Curtis, of Central City; Rev. U. G. Muller, of Loup City; and Miss Clara B. Ross, of St. Paul, Minn.

The Brooklyn Union of Christian Endeavor Societies held its sixth Annual Convention in Plymouth Church on May 16. The exercises began with a sunrise prayer-meeting at 6.30 a.m., and concluded with a great public meeting in the evening, when Dr. Lyman Abbott, and Dr. H. T. McEwen gave addresses.

A deserved tribute to Mr. James Stokes of New York was paid recently by Sir George Williams, the venerable President of the Y. M. C. A. in London. Sir George has returned from his continental trip, with his health fully restored. At his reception in London he said that he and Lady Williams had been most refreshed and encouraged by what they had seen of Y. M. A. work in France, where there were n[illegible] 120 Associations, all free to carry on th[eir] efforts as they chose. In Paris from 600 [to] 700 young men had been got together a day's notice to meet them, and they had a delightful time. They were rejoiced also to have learnt while away of the progress Y. M. C. A. work in Italy. Here centre of operations is shortly to be transferred from Spezia to Rome, and Mr. James Stokes, the noted philanthropist of New York, who is doing so much for young m[en] on the Continent, has a very earnest, consecrated young Italian now in training America, with a view to his becoming national Y. M. C. A. Secretary for Italy.

The last address at the recent Y. M. C. A. International Convention was given on the Saturday night by Mr. D. L. Moody. At the close of his most impressive talk Mr. Moody invited his hearers to attend a meeting to be held at 6 o'clock on Sunday morning. And more than a thousand people were on hand even at that unusual hour.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYER.

In a plain cottage in the village of Cum... ...nson, among the Massachusetts hills, ...was spent the boyhood of one of America's ...greatest poets, William Cullen Bryant, who ...after years, when the world had stamped ...his genius with its seal of approval, dwelt ...in one of the loveliest residences a poetic eye ...could part could desire, at Roslyn, N. Y. ...This beautiful country-seat on the northern ...shore of Long Island is still a Mecca to ...which many of his admirers make pilgrim... age. There, upon a sunny hillside, this noble Christian poet lies buried. John Greenleaf Whittier, the sweet Quaker singer, had his rhymer's castle in a quaint old homestead at Amesbury, Mass., where amid rural surroundings that wooed to gentleness and peace, he sang to the world of God's goodness and loving-kindness to all his creatures. He sleeps beneath the elms at Amesbury and the little children, once a year, cover his grave with garlands. Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, probably the best known of our poets, was, like Whittier, a lover of elm-trees. He made his home in an old revolutionary dwelling at Cambridge, Mass., where Washington had once lodged, when he commanded the nation's armies. Emerson, whom even Hawthorne admired as "a poet of deep beauty and austere tenderness," lived a semi-rural life at Concord, where his days flowed smoothly past, like a river amid the mountains, its clear waters undimmed and unvexed by contiguity with crowded cities. And so with many others of the gifted choir of "nature's songful children;" nearly all have found their chiefest pleasure in coming near to nature.

"Imperious" Wills.

There is no more terrible inheritance for a child than to fall heir to an imperious will. It is certain to prove, sooner or later, a breeder of misfortune. "Everything must be made to bend to your will if you would succeed in life," said a false and shallow philosopher in advising the young. It is a pernicious training that would flatter and encourage a selfish, domineering disposition at the expense of the feelings of others. The unfortunate owner of an "imperious will" generally sacrifices to that particular trait nearly all that is sweet and tender in the relations of life, and finds too late, that the love and esteem that would have spontaneously been offered to a gentler heart, have been sacrificed for dust and ashes.

Nothing that is worth doing in this world is an easy matter; and whatever is really worth doing is worth all that its doing costs —and more. In spite of all its difficulties, training of any child's appetite can be compassed, by God's blessing. And compassed it ought to be, whatever are the difficulties. It is for the parent to decide what the child shall eat, as it is for the parent to decide what the child shall wear. The parent who holds himself responsible for what a child shall put on, but who shirks his responsibility for what that child shall take in, would seem to have more regard for the child's appearance than for his upbuilding from within; and that could hardly be counted a sign of parental wisdom or of parental love.

Florence Nightingale to Girls.

One of the very latest letters written by Florence Nightingale, the Christian heroine, contained this piece of advice to girls:

"My message to the girls is: 1. Train yourselves to your work, to your life. The last twenty-five or thirty years have recognized beyond everything this necessity of training. 2. Have a higher object than the mere undertaking in all you undertake. When we fail or are disappointed, we lose heart and perhaps 'strike work.' But if we have recognized ourselves as (I will not say only) a wheel or a tool in the hands of Him who is highest and truest and best, we have that blessing of being a part of the whole, and, whatever our own failure, are never cast down. 3. As one of the best women workers of our day says, 'The talk is now of rights, not right.' Let not that be our case. I am myself a prisoner from illness and overwork, but all the more I wish you godspeed."

SAVE THE CHILDREN!

SAVE the children! save the children!
'Tis our great Commander's word;
Through the ranks of life's stern battle,
Far above its roar and rattle,
Is the stirring watchword heard.

Save the children, save the children!
Shivering frames with naked feet,
Young hearts, daily evil learning,
Meet our gaze at every turning,
In the alley, court, and street.

Save the children, save the children!
Tiny hairs of want and shame;
Out-stretched hands that fain would reach us,
Wistful faces pale beseech us;
'Twas for such our Saviour came.

Save the children, save the children!
Fold them in the arms of love;
Haste to rescue, e'er they perish,
Tender form and spirit cherish;
'Tis the will of God above.

Save the children, save the children!
Born to sin, and vice, and woe;
Softly tell to each the story,
How the Christ-King, left his glory,
Died because he loved them so.

Training the Appetite.

It is by no means an easy matter for a parent to train a child's appetite; but it is a very important matter, nevertheless.

QUIET MOMENTS.

FROM time to time, letters come from our readers asking how Sunday should be kept, so that the greatest spiritual advantage may be derived. Sunday is a day of rest, and in its observance something of the old Sabbatic peace should linger. To work needlessly on Sunday is far less Christian than to play. But in the cessation from the week's drudgery, the sweetness of family life should reassert itself. The old law tethered people, that they should not stray far from home on the Sabbath. Sunday is the weekly festival of the Christian household. The fathers and the children should be drawn together on that day at the table of the Lord and at the household board. It is well to keep in mind that no day leaves us just where and as it found us. We are with each departing day older in time and nearer the grave. Some addition for good or ill is made to the record of life. We are made better or worse. Habit becomes a little stronger. Our opportunities in life lessen. The need of despatch in the work of life increases. But the Sunday rest and peace grows sweeter and dearer as the years advance.

Obedience.

To obey, with love in the doing, is one of the most precious lessons that can be inculcated in the home. And it should be made quite clear that obedience is not servility; that it is a duty that belongs equally to the high and low in their station. It is said of Henry of Bavaria that at one time becoming weary of court life he determined to enter a monastery. When he presented himself to Prior Richard, the faithful monk gave him the strict rules of Order. The king listened eagerly. Then the prior insisted that obedience, implicit and uninquisitive, was the first requisite of sainthood. The monarch promised to follow his will in every detail. "Go back to the throne and to the station God assigned you," was the prior's word to him. The king took up his sceptre again and learned to govern by learning to obey.

A Helpful Hint to the Boys.

Acquire all the education within your grasp, is the advice of one of America's leading bankers. To keep ones-self thoroughly informed on current events is an education which no man of affairs can afford to neglect. In entering upon a career, first let that career be thoughtfully selected; in the second place, determine to persevere and stick to that career and no other. Do not allow yourself to be carried away into side issues. This quality of being able to adhere to a selected career is most important, for the old adage, "a rolling stone gathers no moss," is truth. The young man who shifts from one line of business to another because he can temporarily increase his salary, is apt to find himself at the age of forty without a career.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER XXI.

Callaghan's Pledge.

THERE were only two, Mrs. Mapleton and Alice, in the carriage, and Alice was thinking of what Mr. Graham had said, indeed her mind was so occupied with thoughts of Fred and that she was soon to see him again, that she was completely oblivious to her present surroundings, and the carriage was nearly at their door when a sob from her mother startled her as if from a dream.

"Mother, dear mother, what is the matter?" asked Alice in a voice of alarm as she took one of her mother's hands in hers, and with the other around her neck, gently drew her head to her own breast as if she were the mother and the mother a little child.

"Oh! what a poor, blind, selfish creature I have been," sobbed Mrs. Mapleton; "not only have I left you to bear the burden and fight the battle alone, but have thoughtlessly added to the burden, and sided with your enemies. How could I have been so blind and so cruel as to want you to marry that man, and to drive away the only one who was true?"

"Now, you must not say another word," said Alice. "How could you help the trouble and sickness that came upon you. I wonder how you have lived through it. I knew that you had all you could bear, so I hid many things from you, and so if I had a heavy load to carry, it was my own fault, for I took it upon myself without asking your advice. But now, dear mother, the clouds are breaking away, the sunlight is breaking through the darkness that has surrounded us so long, and, best of all, Fred is coming. Mr. Graham says he expects him in a few days, and we are going to be happy once more, so you must cheer up and be your own dear self again."

"That is just what I do not want to be," said Mrs. Mapleton, with a faint smile. "I want to be something different. I want to shake off my old self. I have been too selfish all my life. And it seems as if in my case God had granted the wish of Burns:

> Ah! wad some power the gittee gie us,
> Ta see oorsel's as ithers see us:
> It wad frae monie a blunder free us,
> And foolish notion.

My eyes have been opened to-day as never before, and I begin to see myself as others must have seen me. I feel ashamed of myself, and if God gives me once more health and strength, I mean to be somebody else."

"Which shows," said Alice, "that going out has done you good, that your health and spirits are coming back," and she helped her mother out of the carriage, and upstairs to their room, where Mrs. Callaghan had everything looking bright and cozy, and the table set for tea.

"Welcome home, ma'am," said the good woman, as she led Mrs. Mapleton to an easy chair by the fire.

"Thank you, my kind friend," said Mrs. Mapleton; "this is the first time that this room, or any other place, has felt like home since we lost our own dear old one. And now I see how ungrateful I have been. Oh! how many more deserving than I would be thankful for even such a home as this."

"Shure, ma'am, there is not a woman in the block but would think it were a palace she were in, if she could look in here at this blissed moment. Yer not angry wid me, Miss Alice, are ye for going back on me word this morning?" she said when Mrs. Mapleton left the room to remove her wraps.

"No, indeed," said Alice; it was one of the most [illegible] I ever had done for me. You showed more good judgment and common sense than I had. I do not know how you did it, but it must have been the mother in you which prompted and showed you how to act. But, oh! what should I have done had you not acted just as you did!"

"Yer right, Miss, about the mother. I just said to myself, said I, 'how would you feel if one of your own children was in such a fix and it hid from yer?' and once said I to meself, 'I do be thinking that all the mothers, wither they be rich or poor, high up or low down, are alike when it comes to the children; they want to be wid them in their trouble, and stand by them troo thick and thin.'"

As Mr. Callaghan was from home, Mrs. Mapleton insisted on Mrs. Callaghan and Norah sitting down and taking tea with them, much to that good woman's embarrassment and Norah's delight, but they were soon made to feel at home, for Mrs. Mapleton had determined to be more democratic in the future, and was so anxious to begin that she seized this first opportunity. Before Mrs. Callaghan returned to her room, Mrs. Mapleton offered her a glass of wine, which was politely declined. "No offence, mum," said the good-hearted Irish woman, "but you will please excuse, you see, and its ashamed I am to say it, I have been a drinking-woman, and my man was a hard drinker, but now we are teetotal. And all we have in good clothes, furniture, and happiness, we've got since we quit."

"But surely a glass of wine is not against your temperance rules?"

"Excuse me, mum, but he's the same old devil. When he goes among the quality folks he puts on a tail coat, white vest, and shiney boots, and calls himself wine or champagne. Then when he comes among the poor, he puts on a corduroy suit, a battered hat, and stogies, and calls himself whiskey or beer, but he's the same old boy all the time; but it isn't for the loikes of me to be talking this way to you."

"Please go on," said Mrs. Mapleton. "I should like very much to hear the story of your husband's reformation."

"Well, mum, I will not throuble you wid our first happy years of married life, nor how he was led to drink, and how I took to drinking beer, because I was lonely and throubled about John, but I did. John out nearly every night wid one crowd or another, Home Rule Clubs, Irish Leagues, the strikers, and I don't know phat else, but all of 'em met in saloons. Well, one night a man said that there was more money spent in Ireland for drink than all the rents paid of the whole of Ireland came to. And that Irishmen were always ready to go into the business and make slaves of their countrymen, and that rum was a greater tvrant than Great Britain ever was. Ye see, the man had spent all his week's wages, or it had been taken away from him, and he was mad. Well, my man called him a big liar, and they clinched and my man got a dreadful beating, but the crowd nearly killed the other man. My man was brought home and lay abed a week, but even when he was out of his head, he would keep saying, 'its a lie, and I'll prove it,' and would you belave it, the first thing he does when he gets up was to go to get his proof, and he was so disappointed when he did get it, for he comes home and sits down widout saying a word, but just looking at a little book he'd got, when at last says he, 'bedad, its thrue. He towled the truth, and I deserved all I got.'

"Well, only a night or two afterwards he was going up the avenue, when he heard music and singing; it was a mission; he didn't know that, but he went in to get warm. They were holding a temperance meeting, and he heard the men telling phat temperance had done for them, and some of them had been lower down than John had ever been. There were real ladies there and they prayed and sang just beautiful, and when one of them came up to him and spoke kindly to him, and never scholded, but asked him if he wouldn't join the society, he just broke right down, and wid the tears running down his cheeks, he ups and signs the pledge.. Ye see, mum, I didn't know this at the time, for he didn't tell me. But I noticed such a change in John; he wasn't so cross, he quit swearing, he would get up in the morning and light the fire and put on the kettle, and one morning when I wasn't well he brought a cup o' tay to me in bed: he hadn't done such a thing since we were first married, and I just put my head under the clothes and cried when his back was turned.

"Well, on Saturday night he brought me his wages, as he used to do, and more than he had brought home for years. Well, on Sunday he sat wid Harry, thot's my little lame boy as sells papers, and perhaps ye didn't know, mum, that it was a kick from his father, when he was drunk, that lamed him. Well, as I was saying, he sat wid Harry on his knee, and I saw the tears running down his cheek, and a great fear came over me that he was going to be sick, or die, or something, so I got the can of beer, I' always hid it from him before, and says I, 'John you're not yerself to-day, have some beer?' Oh! mum, if ye'd seen the look he gave me, and said he, 'Mary, wud ye be the first to tempt me to break me pledge? Sure, woman, its been the curse of Ireland, the curse of the United States, the curse of the world, its been our curse; see this poor boy's leg, and it was drink made me do it.' Then Harry put his arms around his father's neck and said, 'Papa don't cry, it don't hurt me now, not a bit.' Well, mum, I put the beer away in a hurry and says I, 'John do you think I could do it, too? I'm going to try.' Well, I quit, but I wasn't like John, I felt cross and half sick, and one day John put his arm around me and kind like he said, 'I see what a fight ye are having, old woman, but don't try it alone, go down to the Mission on Wednesday afternoon, and the kind ladies will help ye.' And, mum, I just got up my courage and went. And haven't I been glad ever since that I did. Oh! ye never saw such kindness. There were real ladies, and they prayed wid me, and talked to me, and asked me if I wanted help in any other way. Then they sang beautiful hymns and I signed the pledge, and they put this ribbon on my breast, and I left the hall one of the happiest woman in the town. So ye are not offended that I did'nt take the wine?"

"No, indeed," said Mrs. Mapleton, taking her hand in both of hers. "I respect you for the courage you have shown."

CHAPTER XXII.

The Mary Street Church.

The next day as Mrs. Mapleton and Alice were seated together, the mother said suddenly:

"That was a strange story Mrs. Callaghan told us last night. I suppose temperance is really a good thing for these poor people. They do not seem able to drink at all without drinking to excess. So it is the best thing to let it alone altogether."

"Yes, but it make them marked men to do that. They don't like to have people point at them and say that they abstain because they haven't self-control enough to keep from getting drunk. They feel ashamed. That is where good people can help them. When a good man who never gets drunk and is never likely to do so, voluntarily signs the pledge to set an example to those who do get drunk, he helps to make abstinence fashionable, and make the drunkard feel that as a teetotaler he will be in respectable company. It is a Christlike thing to do, and I have done it."

"I never thought of that," said Mrs. Mapleton, "but I see how it would help the poor men. What a great deal you know and think about that I know nothing of. Alice, I wish I had been a better mother. I wonder if it is too late now to get religion."

"Dear Mamma, it is now my turn to make a confession," said Alice, "Fred once told me that he went to a church on Mary Street, and that he taught a Sunday School class there, and that it was not a fashionable church, but a live one. Well in our darkest hour, I thought of Fred's church and found that it was not far away. I knew that it must be the church, for the street was short and had only one church on it. So one Sunday night I went, I am afraid that was more with the hope of hearing something of Fred than with worthier motives that I did go. The church was crowded, and when Mr. Joy, the minister, came in, I was not a little astonished to see him shake hands with people all the way down the aisle, and in such a hearty manner. He walked on to the platform and gave out a hymn, and everybody sang and with all their might, too, but I felt that their hearts were in it, too, and I found myself singing, as I had not sung for a long time. Then the prayer—I was shocked at first—I thought he was a little too familiar with the Lord. Then the sermon—shall I ever forget it! It was so different from anything I had ever heard. I thought he was not sufficiently dignified for a clergyman, but I soon found myself carried away by the theme. He talked to the people the same as if he was their father and would call and praise them in the most familiar manner, and in the plainest language. Well after the meeting, they stood in groups, shaking hands and appeared so happy, and it all seemed so strange to me. I felt so happy, so I went again and soon found what I had been yearning for, sympathy, spiritual strength, in other words religion, so I joined their church."

At the end of Alice's story Mrs. Mapleton gave a long breath and a deep sigh. Then Alice in her arms and laid her head on her breast and said: "You shall take care of me, my dear, I believe that is just the place where I want to go."

Just then Norah brought in a note; it was from Louie, such a pathetic little note. Her mother had not been out of bed since that dreadful day, and was most of the time out of her mind and then she was always calling for Alice and Mrs. Mapleton, would she come? She (Louie) could not leave her mother and she had something to tell Alice which she must tell her, or her heart would break. Before Alice had finished reading the letter Mrs. Mapleton was putting on her hat and mantle.

They were soon on their way. Poor Louie with pale face and swollen eyes met them at the door, and she and Alice were in each other's arms in a moment.

Alice was a little surprised to see Nettie with her pale face and wild-looking eyes appear out of a door, Louie noticed the look and explained that they still kept Nettie's father had insisted upon it, and she was so glad that the poor ruined girl had been sent away.

Mrs. Mapleton was soon in Mrs. Wilson's room bending over the invalid. Mrs. Wilson after a long gaze up into the kind motherly face with tear-filled eyes above her, recognized the visitor, and reaching up her arms put them around her neck. Mrs. Mapleton kissed her, both were crying. Alice so stooped and kissed the sick woman, not a word was spoken. Mrs. Mapleton put her arm under Mrs. Wilson's head, and with the other hand smoothed back her hair from her forehead, as if she were a child, and in a few minutes the patient was sleeping as peacefully as a babe. It was the first refreshing sleep she had had for many days and nights.

As soon as there was a chance Louie almost dragged Alice to her rooms, and locked the door. She placed Alice in a chair and knelt upon her knees by her side, put her arms around her waist and looking up in her face, said, "Oh, Alice! no wonder Will loved you so. I never knew until after, that he was your brother."

"What, dear?" asked Alice in amazement. "Why, Will. We were engaged, and how we loved each other; and it was Mamma made us promise that we would not correspond until he was able to come to me in the same style I had been used to. Oh! they didn't know that I had a father have shared a log hut with children have lived in a palace with any one else. And dear Will said that mother was right. But he told me not to doubt him, he would come, and we promised each other to be true. Well, mother, when she got out of her mind, said that."—and here she broke down and sobbed—"that—that Will was dead and that they must not tell me how pale father looked, and I asked him if it was true, and he took me in his arms and told me it was true, and I never saw father cry before, so I knew that it was. Oh! what shall I do?

"Your poor, dear darling," said Alice, holding her in her arms. "We never had the courage yet to look over his letters, to see then are the Louie for whom he was writing the album of pressed flowers, the 'Flora' of Mexico. You shall have it as it is; it must have been his last work, and shows that his last thoughts were of you. And we will be sisters, dear Louie, and we will love each other as long as we live. Poor, dear Will, he was a brother to be proud of." For an hour they sat locked in each other's arms, each making a confidant of the other.

It is a Complete Dictionary, containing every word in the English language, 250,000 in all, which no other dictionary does. Every word is exhaustively treated as to its origin, history, development, etymology, pronunciation, and various meanings.

It is a Thorough Encyclopedia of anatomy, botany, chemistry, zoology, geology, art, music, agriculture, physics, philosophy, mechanics, history, mythology, Biblical knowledge, and every other subject known to the human intellect.

It is a Superb Library Book, being substantially and attractively bound, printed from new plates in large, clear type, on heavy white paper, and illustrated with hundreds of new pictures made especially for this work.

It is Better than All Other Dictionaries, because the latest edition of Webster's Dictionary is only one volume, contains only 140,000 words, and costs from $12 to $15; the latest edition of Worcester is one volume, contains only 116,000 words, and costs from $10 to $12; the Standard is only two volumes, contains a little over 200,000 words, and costs from $17 to $22; the Century contains but 225,000 words, and costs $60 to $200; while The Encyclopædic Dictionary contains 5,357 pages in four volumes, has 250,000 words, 50,000 cyclopedic subjects, and is new and up to date, costs less than any of them.

which formerly sold at $42 to $70 per set, is now offered all readers of The Christian Herald for $1.87 1-2 per volume, or $7.50 for the complete set of four volumes. All orders must be received before June 25, or not at all. Should any orders be received after that date, the money will be refunded by return mail.

AFTER JUNE 25, THE PRICE WILL BE FROM $16 TO $24 AND ABSOLUTELY NO DISCOUNT WILL BE ALLOWED. IT WILL BE SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION, AND CANNOT BE OBTAINED IN ANY BOOKSTORE.

WHAT GOOD JUDGES SAY ABOUT THE WORK.

I prize highly The Encyclopædic Dictionary for the number of words it contains, for accuracy of definitions, for fullness of illustrations, and for encyclopædic comprehensiveness. Rodney Norman Fullerton, Chicago, Ill.

As a reference book it stands in the front rank. As a dictionary it meets every demand. Rev. G. W. Rogers, Atchison, Kan.

The Encyclopædic Dictionary opens the dictionary war which may involve the Century, the Standard, and the International.—New York World.

Has many distinctive claims to superiority. Such a work has long been needed by the business man, the active student, and in the home circle.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

My library contains the Century and the latest Webster, but I have found much information in "The Encyclopædic" not in either of the former. I regard the work as invaluable. Fred W. Goss, Judge 5th Judicial District, Colo.

I consider The Encyclopædic Dictionary superior to Webster, Worcester, Century, or Standard. For the busy lawyer who wants to know things quickly, no better reference book could be had. Benjamin F. Hughes, Attorney and ex-State Senator, Philadelphia.

I have Webster, Worcester, and the Century, and for encyclopædias I have the Britannica and Appleton's. It is but simple truth to say that The Encyclopædic Dictionary is a magnificent substitute for all of them. J. H. Atwood, Attorney, Leavenworth, Kan.

I have examined The Encyclopædic Dictionary, and am much pleased with it. It is valuable as a dictionary and as a work of reference. It is copious and yet concise. In all respects it is a work that every student should possess. George T. Werts, Governor State of New Jersey.

THE HUSBANDMAN.

GOD compass thee with favor as a shield,
Through all the season's changeful days and hours,
The changes be as to some fruitful field, [ers.
Where sun is shaded but for gracious show-
His favor by the strength to serve and yield,
As earth serves heaven by yielding fruits and flowers.

If biting frosts come from the bitter north,
'Tis but to fray the earth to readier mold,
'Neath leaden skies the sower goeth forth,
And fills the furrows with a wealth of gold,
Though wild winds sweep and howl in threatening wrath.
The seed corn sleeps within thy heart; be bold.

There cometh soon a time when storms are still,
When all the earth is arched with sunny blue
When thou shalt find the end of good and ill,
And how through all the harvest ripened grew;
Thy Father is the husbandman. His will
Is ever good who maketh all things new.

Since blackened roots and shapeless, withered seeds
By patient skill he brings to fairest flowers;
Since he can meet a whole world's hungry needs
By sunshine and soft winds and passing showers;
Up to what beauty and what service leads
His love, when we are his and he is ours!

—MARK GUY PEARSE.

STUNDISM SPREADING IN RUSSIA.

According to a recent article contributed by a Russian clergyman to the Moscow "Gazette," the religious and much-persecuted sect known as the Stundists, are making rapid progress in many parts of the Czar's dominion. He writes that the rigorously suppressive laws lately promulgated against them, are not only unsuccessful, but would actually appear to have given a renewed impetus both to the open and to the clandestine spread of Stundism, and to its spread among the intelligent class of Russians who have practically abandoned the State Church, or who, when they hold bureaucratic positions, attend the church service once or twice a year as a mere official habit and custom. It is also to this growing public inclination towards Stundism that the writer attributes the difficulty of getting the majority of the ordinary magistracy to convict the Stundist propagandists, and for the same reason large employers ignore the legal injunctions laid upon them with regard to the exclusion of Stundist work-people of both sexes. It is by the force of example, by their exemplary lives, their high-toned morality, sobriety, industry, thrift, and honest dealings that they make converts. Many thousands of formerly ignorant, intemperate, and degraded peasants voluntarily adopted the Stundist teaching and copied the manners and morals of the Sectarians. There are no more conscientiously law-abiding subjects in Russia.

New Cure for Kidneys and Bladder.

We are glad to announce to sufferers from kidney and bladder diseases, pain in back, and rheumatism that the new botanic discovery Alkavis, is pronounced a positive cure for these maladies. Many of its cures are certainly wonderful, and we advice our readers to send name and address to the Church Kidney Cure Company, 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, who will send you treatment free by mail postpaid. It costs you nothing.

dictates that you use materials when painting that you know something about. Pure White Lead and Pure Linseed Oil are said have been the standard for years. You know all about them; if you don't your painter does. To make sure, however, examine the brand (see list).

For colors, use National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead tinting colors; they are the best and most permanent; prepared expressly for tinting Pure White Lead. Pamphlet and color-card free.

Keep your eye on Pearline "ads."

Even if you use it already, you'll find hints here and there that will greatly help you. And there isn't a man, woman, or child but can be helped by Pearline.

All these advertisements are meant for the good of Pearline, of course—to show you the best and easiest and cheapest way of washing and cleaning, and to lead you to use it. But if they do, they will have helped you far more than they will have helped Pearline. You have more at stake. All the money you could bring to Pearline, by using it, wouldn't be a drop in the bucket to the money you'd save by it.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 470 JAMES PYLE, New York.

BUFFALO Springs Nos. 1 & 2 LITHIA WATER

IN BRIGHT'S DISEASE OF THE KIDNEYS.

Extract from Report on "Therapeutics and Practice of Medicine." Read before the Medical Society of the State of North Carolina, May, 1894. By E. C. Laird, M. D., Haw River, N. C.

"During the last season (as Resident Physician at the Springs) your reporter used the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Nos. 1 and 2, in almost every form and stage of acute and chronic Bright's disease of the Kidneys and Diabetes with most gratifying results. This action of these waters cannot be attributed to the effect of the large quantity of pure water passed through the system, as suggested by some writers, for in many instances the beneficial effects produced by one Spring would be greatly enhanced by change to the other, and vice versa, showing some special curative action of each water in the individual case. This I attribute to two well established effects of these waters, first their powerful solvent and eliminating action on uric acid, which is considered by Tyson and others the principal excitant of Bright's disease, and secondly to their nerve tonic properties, thus enhancing the wide range of adaptability to the cause of trouble, whether commencing with "mind strain" from overwork, worry or sorrow, as suggested by Drs. Thom, Howard and Flint in "Virginia Medical Monthly," May, 1894, or to one or more of the diatheses, either Gouty, Rheumatic, Oxalic, Lithæmic or Diabetic."

This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

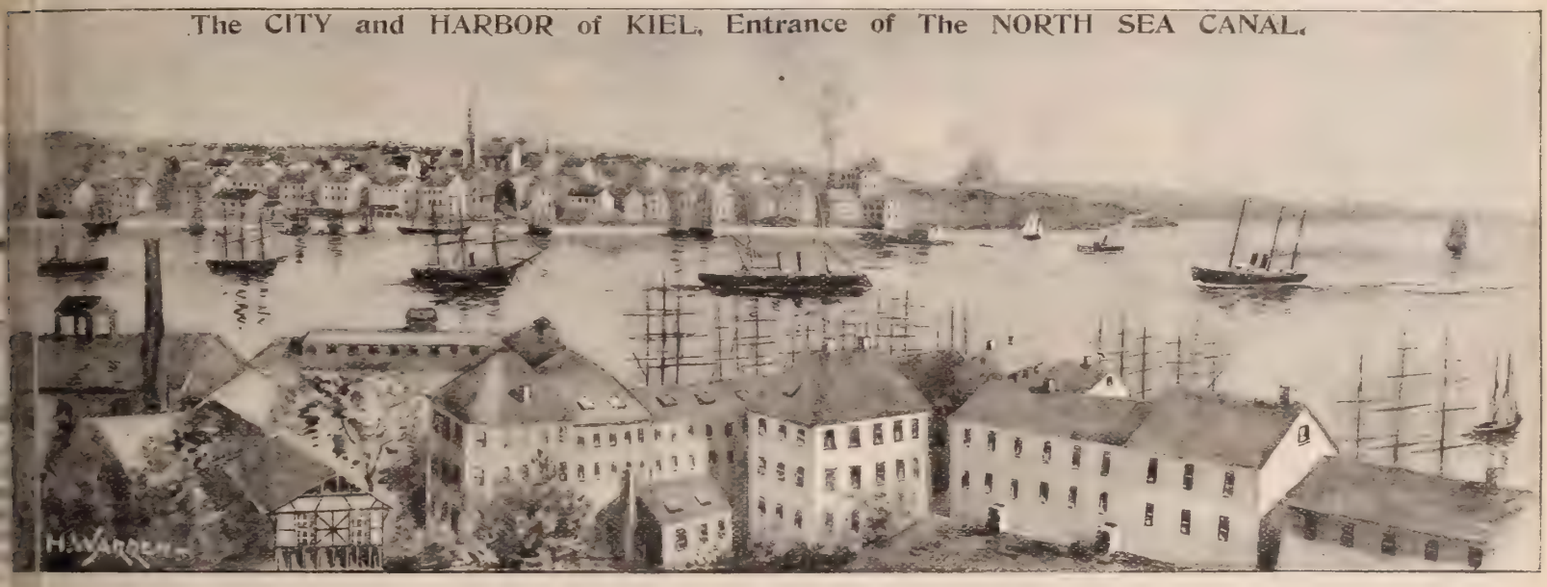
The CITY and HARBOR of KIEL, Entrance of The NORTH SEA CANAL.



THE MARRIAGE OF TWO SEAS.

The Maritime World Preparing for the Opening of the New North Sea Canal—A Great Work Successfully Completed—Its Advantages to Commerce and Civilization.

DURING the present month of June, the ancient port of Kiel will be the scene of the grandest naval gathering that has been witnessed in Europe in many years. Not the spirit of war, but in peace and amity will the great fleets of the maritime nations of the world assemble there, and the days of festivity to follow will be marked by a free and generous interchange of international courtesies. The occasion of this remarkable demonstration is the formal opening of the North Sea Canal, which will be celebrated on June 19, 20, 21 and 22. The official programme has been arranged by the German government, under whose direction the great Canal was planned and brought to successful completion. With a proper national pride in the enterprise, which will confer benefits upon the entire civilized world, Germany has resolved to signalize the event an epoch in her national history. All the arrangements are upon a magnificent scale of liberality, and the numerous hearty responses to the invitations sent to other governments prove that the seafaring powers, great and small, are glad to honor the enterprise by sharing in the approaching festival of triumph. Thus, although under the auspices of Germany, it will have a distinctly international aspect. Our own navy will be represented by the warships, New York, Columbia, San Francisco and Marblehead, under Admiral Kirkland. For the purpose of adding to the general rejoicing at "the marriage of the two seas"—the stormy Baltic and the restless, turbulent North Sea—our ships have taken a liberal supply of lights and will make the finest electric display of all the fleets. The official ceremonies open with a banquet in the City Hall at Hamburg on June 19, at which all the leading representatives of other nations who have accepted invitations will be present. Next day, the international fleets will pass through Brunsbuettel sluice into the Canal, and will proceed along its entire length in procession, reaching Holtenau in the afternoon. Here Emperor William will tender his guests a reception on the royal yacht Hohenzollern, and along the entire line of the Canal festivities will continue two days, interspersed with banquets, parades and fireworks, the ceremonies closing with naval manœuvres on the 22nd, after which the fleets will separate and the strangers will take their departure.

As long ago as the sixteenth century, the project of a great canal to connect the Baltic with the North Sea, was first agitated; but it was not until twenty-six years ago that the scheme took definite shape. In 1869 plans were submitted to the Reichstag in connection with this work, but nothing further was done at that time. In 1886, the installation of the Kaiserliche Canal Building Commissioners took place, Commissioner Baensch being appointed Chief Director. After much discussion as to the route, and various changes, the track of the Canal was finally agreed upon and its length was fixed at ninety-eight kilometres (a kilometre is 1093.63 yards or about five-eighths of a mile.) Its route was from the Baltic to the Elbe, crossing the Prussian province of Holstein. Beginning at Holtenau, near Kiel, it was to cross Rendsburg, and thence by a southwestern course, ending at Brunsbuettel, at the mouth of the Elbe. 150,000,000 marks (about $37,500,000) was the amount appropriated for the execution of the work. Prussia, being the nearest and therefore the most directly interested, contributed fully one-third of the entire sum. It was an extensive investment, but one from which the different governments concerned expected

"SHAMGAR'S OX-GOAD."

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., on the Text: "After him was Shamgar, which slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox-goad." Judges 3: 31.

ONE day while Shamgar, the farmer, was plowing with a yoke of oxen, his command of whoa-haw-gee was changed to the shout of battle. Philistines, always ready to make trouble, march up with sword and spear. Shamgar, the plowman, had no sword, and would not probably have known how to wield it if he had possessed one. But fight he must, or go down under the stroke of the Philistines. He had an ox-goad—a weapon used to urge on the lazy team; a weapon about eight feet long, with a sharp iron at one end to puncture the beast, and a wide iron chisel, or shovel, at the other end with which to scrape the clumps of soil from the plowshare. Yet, with the iron prong at one end of the ox-goad, and the iron scraper at the other, it was not such a weapon as one would desire to use in battle with armed Philistines. But God helped the farmer, and leaving the oxen to look after themselves, he charged upon the invaders of his homestead. Some of the commentaries, to make it easier for Shamgar, suggest that perhaps he led a regiment of farmers into the combat, his ox-goad only one of many ox-goads. But the Lord does not need any of you to help in making the Scriptures, and Shamgar, with the Lord on his side, was mightier than six hundred Philistines with the Lord against them. The battle opened. Shamgar, with muscle strengthened by open air, and plowman's, and reaper's, and thresher's toil, uses the only weapon at hand, and he swings the ox-goad up and down, and this way and that; now stabbing with the iron prong at one end of it, and now thrusting with the iron scraper at the other, and now bringing down the whole weight of the instrument upon the heads of the enemy. The Philistines are in a panic, and the supernatural forces come in, and a blow that would not under other circumstances have prostrated or slain, left its victim lifeless; until when Shamgar walked over the field, he counted one hundred dead, two hundred dead, three hundred dead, four hundred dead, five hundred dead, six hundred dead—all the work done by an ox-goad with iron prong at one end and an iron shovel at the other. The fame of this achievement by this farmer with an awkward weapon of war, spread abroad, and lionized him, until he was hoisted into the highest place of power, and became the third of the mighty judges of Israel. So you see that Cincinnatus was not the only man lifted from plow to throne.

For what reason was this unprecedented and unparalleled victory of a farmer's ox-goad put into this Bible, where there was no spare room for the unimportant and the trivial?

It was, first of all, to teach you, and to teach me, and to teach all past ages since then, and to teach all ages to come, that in the war for God, and against sin, we ought to put to the best use the weapon we happen to have on hand. Why did not Shamgar wait until he could get a war charger, with neck arched, and back caparisoned, and nostrils sniffing the battle afar off, or until he could get war equipment, or could drill a regiment, and wheeling them into line, command them forward to the charge? To wait for that would have been defeat and annihilation. So he takes the best weapon he could lay hold of, and that is an ox-goad. We are called into the battle for the right, and against wrong, and many of us have not just the kind of weapon we would prefer. It may not be a sword of argument. It may not be the spear of sharp, thrusting wit. It may not be the battering-ram of denunciation. But there is something we can do, and some forces we can wield. Do not wait for what you have not, but use what you have. Perhaps you have not eloquence, but you have a smile. Well, a smile of encouragement has changed the behavior of tens of thousands of wanderers, and brought them back to God, and enthroned them in heaven. You cannot make a persuasive appeal, but you can set an example, and a good example has saved more souls than you could count in a year, if you counted all the time. You cannot give ten thousand dollars, but you can give as much as the widow of the Gospel, whose two mites, the smallest coins of the Hebrews, were bestowed in such a spirit as to make her more famous than all the contributions that ever endowed all the hospitals and universities of all Christendom, of all time. You have very limited vocabulary, but you can say "yes" or "no," and a firm "yes," or an emphatic "no," has traversed the centuries, and will traverse all eternity, with good influence. You may not have the courage to confront a large assemblage, but you can tell a Sunday School class of two—a boy and a girl—how to find Christ, and one of them may become a William Carey, to start influences that will redeem India, and the other a Florence Nightingale, who will illumine battle-fields covered with the dying and the dead.

That was a tough case in a town of England where a young lady, applying for a Sabbath School class, was told by the superintendent she would have to pick up one out of the street. The worst of the class brought from the street was one Bob. He was fitted out with respectable clothing by the superintendent. But after two or three Sabbaths he disappeared. He was found with his clothes in tatters, for he had been fighting. The second time Bob was well-clad for school. After coming once or twice, he again disappeared, and was found in rags, consequent upon fighting. The teacher was disposed to give him up, but the superintendent said, "Let us try him again," and the third suit of clothes was provided him. Thereafter he came until he was converted, and joined the church, and started for the Gospel ministry, and became a foreign missionary, preaching and translating the Scriptures. Who was the boy called Bob? The illustrious Dr. Robert Morrison, great on earth, and greater in heaven. Who his teacher was I know not; but she used the opportunity opened, and great has been her reward. You may not be able to load an Armstrong gun; you may not be able to hurl a Hotchkiss shell; you may not be able to shoulder a glittering musket; but use anything you can lay your hands on. Try a blacksmith's hammer, or a merchant's yard-stick, or a mason's trowel, or a carpenter's plane, or a housewife's broom, or a farmer's ox-goad. One of the surprises of heaven will be what grand results came from how simple means. Matthias Joyce, the vile man, became a great apostle of righteousness, not from hearing John Wesley preach, but from seeing him kiss a little child on the pulpit stairs.

Again, my subject springs upon us the thought that in calculating the prospects of religious attempt, we must take omnipotence, and omniscience, and omnipresence, and all the other attributes of God into the calculation. Whom do you see on that plowed field of my text? One hearer says, "I see Shamgar." Another hearer says, "I see six hundred Philistines." My hearer, you have missed the chief personage on that battle-field of plowed ground. I also see Shamgar, and six hundred Philistines, but more than all, and mightier than all and more overwhelming than all, I see God Shamgar with his unaided arm, however muscular, and with that humble instrument made for agricultural purposes, and never constructed for combat, could not have wrought such victory. It was Omnipotence above, and beneath, and back of, and at the point of the ox-goad. Before that battle was over, the plowman realized this, and all the six hundred Philistines realized it, and all who visited the battle-field afterward appreciated it. I want in heaven to hear the story, for it can never be fully told on earth—perhaps some day may be set apart for the rehearsal, while all heaven listens—the story of how God blessed awkward and humble instrumentalities. Many an evangelist has come into a town given up to worldliness. The pastors say to the evangelist, "We are glad you have come, but it is a hard field, and we feel sorry for you. The members of our churches play progressive euchre, and go to the theatre, and bet at the horse races, and gaiety and fashion have taken possession of the town. We have advertised your meetings, but are not very hopeful. God bless you." This evangelist takes his place on platform or pulpit. He never graduated at college, and there are before him twenty graduates of the best universities. He never took one lesson in elocution, and there are before him twenty trained orators. Many of the ladies present are graduates of the highest female seminaries, and one slip in grammar or one mispronunciation, will result in suppressed giggle. Amid the general chill that pervades the house, the unpretending evangelist opens his Bible and takes for his text, "Lord, that my eyes may be opened." Opera glasses in the gallery curiously scrutinize the speaker. He tells in a plain way the story of the blind man, tells two or three touching anecdotes, and the general chill gives way before a strange warmth. A classical hearer who took the first honor at Yale, and who is a prince of proprieties, finds his spectacles becoming dim with a moisture suggestive of tears. A worldly mother who has been bringing up her sons and daughters in utter godlessness, puts her handkerchief to her eyes and begins to weep. Highly educated men who came to criticize, and pick to pieces, and find fault, bow on their gold-headed canes. What is that sound from under the gallery? It is a sob, and sobs are catching; and all along the wall, and all up and down the audience, there is deep emotion, so that when at the close of the service anxious souls are invited to especial seats, or the inquiry room, they come up by scores, and kneel and repent, and rise up pardoned; the whole town is shaken, and places of evil amusement are sparsely attended, and rum holes lose their patrons, and the churches are thronged, and the whole community is cleansed, and elevated, and rejoiced. What power did the evangelist bring to bear to capture that town for righteousness? Not one brilliant epigram did he utter. Not one graceful gesture did he make. Not one rhetorical climax did he pile up. But there was something about him that people had not taken in the estimate when they prophesied the failure of that work. They had not taken into the calculation the Omnipotence of the Holy Ghost. It was not the flash of a Damascus blade. It was God, before and behind, and all around the ox-goad. When people say that crime will triumph and the world will never be converted because of the seeming insufficiency of the means employed, they count the six hundred armed Philistines on one side and Shamgar, the farmer, awkwardly equipped on the other side; not realizing that the chariots of God are twenty thousand, and that all heaven, cherubic, seraphic, and angelic, Deific, is on what otherwise would be the weak side. Napoleon, the author of the saying, "God is on the side of the heaviest artillery," lived to find out his mistake; for at Waterloo, the one hundred and sixty guns of the English overcame two hundred and fifty guns of the French. God is on the side of the right, and one man in the right will eventually be found stronger than six hundred men in the wrong. In all estimates of any kind of Christian work, do not make the mistake every day made of leaving out the Head of the University.

Again, my subject springs upon the thought that in God's service it is best to use weapons that are particularly suited to us. Shamgar had, like many of us, been brought up on a farm. He knew nothing about javelins, and bucklers, and helmets, and breastplates, and greaves of brass, and catapults, and ballistæ, and iron scythes fastened to the axles of chariots. But he was familiar with the flail that threshing-floor, and knew how to pound with that; and the axe of the woodman knew how to hew with that; and the goad of the plowman, and knew how to thrust with that. And you and I had best to use those means that we can best handle; those weapons with which we can make the most execution. Some in the service will do best with the pen; some with the voice; some by extemporaneous address, for they have the whole vocabulary of the English language half way between the brain and tongue; and others will do best with manuscript spread out before them. Some will serve God by the plow, sowing wheat and corn, and giving liberally of what they sell, to churches and missions; some as merchants, and out of their profits will dedicate a tenth to the Lord; some as physicians, prescribing for the woes and ailments; and some as attorneys, defending innocence, and obtaining rights that otherwise would not be recognized; and some as sailors, helping bridge the seas; and some as teachers and pastors. The Kingdom of God is dreadfully retarded by so many of us attempting to do that which we cannot do; reaching up for broadsword, or battle-axe, or bayonet, or scimeter, or infantry rifle, or Paixhans gun, while we ought to be content with an ox-goad. I think that there are tens of thousands of Christians whom you never heard of, and never will hear of until you see them in the high places of Heaven, who are now in quiet way in homes, and school-houses, and praying circles, and by sick beds, and in dark alleys, saying the saving word, doing the saving deed; the aggregate of their work overpowering the most pretentious statistics. In the grand review of heaven, when the regiments pass the Lord of Hosts, there will be whole regiments of nurses, and Sabbath School teachers, and tract distributors, and unpretending workers, before whom, as they pass, the kings and queens of God and the Lamb lift the flashing coronet, and bow down in adoration and reverence. The most of the Christian work for the world's reclamation and salvation will be done by people of one talent, and two talents, while the three talent people are up in the astronomical observatories studying other worlds, though they do little or nothing for the redemption of this world; or are up in the rarified realms of "Higher Criticism" trying to prove that Moses did not write the Pentateuch, or to prove that the throat of the whale ndarge enough to swallow the minister w declined the call to Nineveh, and apol-oging for the Almighty for certain inex-plible things they have found in the Sctures. It will be found out at the last th the Krupp guns have not done so mh to capture this world for God as the oxoads.

ears ago I was to summer in the Adi-rodacks, and my wealthy friend, who was a eat hunter and fisherman, said, "I am nogoing to the Adirondacks this season, anyou can take my equipment, and I will se it up to Paul Smith's. Well, it was the when I arrived in the Adirondacks, a spadid outfit, that cost many hundreds of do-rs, a gorgeous tent, and such elaborate fishg apparatus; such guns of all styles of iquisite make, and reels, and pouches, anbait, and torches, and lunch baskets, anmany more things that I could not eve guess the use of. And my friend of theig soul had even written on and en-gagd men who should accompany me into thforest and carry home the deer and the tro. If the mountains could have seen andunderstood it at the time, there would hav been panic among the antlers, and the finthrough all the "John-Brown's Tract."

W I am no hunter, and not a roe-buck, or ame fish did I injure. But there were hu-rs there that season who had nothing but plain gun, and a rug to sleep on, and n of fishing line, and a box of ammuni-tionand bait, who came in ever and anon witas many of the captives of forest and stren as they and two or three attendants cou carry. Now, I fear that many Chris-ian workers who have most elaborate edu-catinal, and theological, and professional equipment, and most wonderful weaponry, auffent, you would think, to capture a whe community, or a whole nation for Godwill in the Last Day, have but little ex-eptheir fine tackling to show; while some whohad no advantages except that which neyot in prayer and consecration, will by he uls they have brought to the shore of tenl safety, prove that they have been glorusly successful as fishers of men, and a ing many who, like the hart, were anig after the water-brooks. What tacthe Amalekites run before Gideon's arm Each one of the army knew how toc racket the breaking of one pitcher ou make. So three hundred men that igh took three hundred pitchers, and a laminside the pitcher, and at a given sig-al e lamps were lifted, and the pitchers erviolently dashed down. The flash of te ht and the racket of the three hun-edemolished pitchers sent the enemy in-wi flight. Not much of a weapon, you ou say, is a broken pitcher, but the Lord ad that awful crash of crockery the sea of triumph for his people. And there y to be a battle with the pitchers. The igh of the world's dissipation may get arl and darker, but after awhile, in what at of the night I know not, all the ale tchers, and the wine pitchers, and the gin itchers, and the whiskey pitchers of te rth will be hurled into demolition by mi ted inebriates and Christian reform-s, nd at that awful crash of infernal ou ry the Amalekitish host of pauper-m, nd loaferdom, and domestic quarrel, ad uelty, and assassination will fly the ut Take the first weapon you can lay ouhands on. Why did David choose e ing when he went at Goliath, and oli h went at him. Brought up in the un y, like every other boy he knew how m age a sling. Saul's armor was first it him, but the giant's armor was too sm. The helmet was clapped on him a extinguisher, and David said, "I can-ot with these, for I have not proved em." And the first wise thing David did te putting on Saul's armor was to put it T. hen the brook Elah, the bed of which as y when I saw it, and one vast reach p bles, furnished the five smooth stones th brook with which Goliath was pros-at Whether it be a boy's sling, or a ro-h pitcher, or an ox-goad, take that hi you can manage, and ask God for help, and no power on earth or in hell can stand before you.

Go out, then, I charge you, against the Philistines. We must admit the odds are against us—six hundred to one. In the matter of dollars, those devoted to worldliness, and sin, and dissipation, when compared with the dollars devoted to holiness and virtue — six hundred to one. The houses set apart for vice, and despoliation, and ruin, as compared with those dedicated to good, six hundred to one. Of printed newspaper sheets scattered abroad from day to day, those depraving as compared with those elevating, are six hundred to one. The agencies for making the world worse compared with the agencies for making the world better, six hundred to one. But Moses in his song, chants "How should one chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight?" and in my text one ox-goad conquers six hundred uplifted battle-axes; and the day of universal victory is coming, unless the Bible be a fabrication, and eternity a myth, and the chariots of God are unwheeled on the golden streets, and the last regiment of the celestial hosts lies dead on the plains of heaven. With us, or without us, the work will be done. Oh, get into the ranks somewhere, armed somehow; you with a needle; you with a pen, you with a good book; you with a loaf of bread for the hungry; you with a vial of medicine for the sick; you with a pair of shoes for the bare-footed; you with word of encouragement for the young man trying to get back from evil ways; you with some story of the Christ who came to heal the worst wounds and pardon the blackest guilt, and call the farthest wanderer home. I say to you as the watchman of London used to say at night to the house-holders, before the time of street lamps came: "Hang out your light!" "Hang out your light!" "Hang out your light!"

THE FAITH OF A CHILD.

"Except ye be as a little child," said the Saviour. This was beautifully illustrated in an anecdote recently related by Mr. Moody, the evangelist. A man enlisted in the Civil War, and left a wife and two children, the wife not in good health. One cold day in November, in the first year of the war, the news came that he was killed in battle. Soon after, the landlord came round for his rent, and she told him her trouble, and said she would not be able to pay the rent, as she had only her needle by which she could obtain a livelihood. The man was heartless, and said that if she did not pay the rent regularly, he would turn her out. After he went away, the mother began to weep. Her little girl, not quite five, came up to her and said, "Mamma, is not God very rich?"—"Yes, my child."—"Can't God take care of us?"—"Yes."—"Then what makes you cry? Mayn't I go and ask him?" The mother said she might if she liked. The little child knelt at her cradle, and she had never look so sweet. "Oh Lord," she lisped, "You have taken away my dear father, and the landlord says he will turn us out of doors, and my mamma has no money; won't you please lend us a little house to live in?" And then she came out to her mother, and said, "Mamma, don't weep. Jesus will take care of us. I know he will, for I have asked him." That mother has never paid any rent from that day to this. A cottage was provided for her and her two children and she has lived there ever since—a lasting testimony to the triumphant faith of a child.

great results in very largely increased commercial advantages. In order to commence this work it was necessary to remove 69,000,000 cubic yards of soil. At times as many as 7,000 laborers were employed, all of whom had to be paid, fed, and lodged at the expense of the Canal Fund. The whole work is splendidly and substantially performed. At Holtenau, where the canal begins, a dam, which is almost a fac-simile of another one at Brunsbuettel, was constructed for the purpose of preserving the country against inundation at high tides; there being an annual flood each spring, lasting about thirty-one days. One can imagine how strong a dam must be, to resist the force of such a flood; yet the sides of the dams stand firm as rocks. Holtenau was formerly an insignificant place; but since the building of the Canal it has grown quite important, and many new buildings have been erected

The North Sea Canal, in order to allow for the large war-ships and other vessels of magnitude that will pass to and fro, has an average width of 239 feet. At various places where there are marshes or small lakes it is considerably wider. These lakelets are a very pleasing sight to a passenger on the deck of a steamer, as sometimes they give the only variety to the scenery for miles. At other points where the canal cuts through natural inland waters, the effect is very picturesque indeed. Otherwise, the scenery consists principally of sand hills with here and there some patches of grass, and is exceedingly monotonous.

Probably the greatest wonder of this great work is to be found in the ingenious mechanism employed in the construction of the draws or locks and the various bridges that span the canal. Traffic from shore to shore is facilitated by eighteen ferries, two span bridges and five draw-bridges. Of the two bridges, one crosses the Canal at Grunenthal, and the other at Levensau, and each rises clear of the Canal and its shipping with one majestic curve, so high that the highest masts can pass unharmed beneath. Levensau bridge is designed for the traffic of the Kiel-Flensburger railway and it has been open since November last. These two magnificent bridges were constructed largely owing to the influence of Emperor William, who believed that draw-bridges at these points would not be satisfactory. But the draw-bridges are even more of a wonder to the population than the other bridges. At Rendsburg there are three, all operated with one engine, and opened or closed by the combined power of steam and the water of the Canal. It is claimed in Germany that these draw-bridges are the most perfect structures of the kind in Europe.

Great expectations are indulged in connection with the North Sea Canal's financial future, and the general impression seems to be that it will be a pronounced success and that the labor and outlay of many years will be amply repaid. As in the case of the Berlin Railway, the construction of the Canal is due in great measure to the dominant influence of the military spirit in Germany, as well as to the desire for commercial progress. It is now possible, by utilizing the Canal, to send a German fleet from the North Sea to the Baltic in thirteen hours. But while the Canal may be thus an advantage in war, it will be a still greater and far more welcome benefit in time of peace. The constant sacrifice of human lives and noble vessels amid the dangers of the Skager-Rack and Kattegat will now be averted, as ships of every tonnage can pass in safety through the Canal, thus saving time and avoiding peril. To those countries trading between the North Sea and the Baltic, the shortening of the usual sea route to Hamburg by 425 miles is a matter of the highest importance. Passenger traffic from Western Europe to the Baltic will be greatly augmented, and trade everywhere will be stimulated. Thus a multitude of interests will be served and nations that have heretofore cherished antagonisms, may even be brought by this means to an attitude of friendly intercourse if not of complete conciliation. In the coming years, it may be demonstrated that, in the wisdom of Divine Providence, this great work — whose strength and value were seemingly destined to be reserved for warlike uses—was really created for the most beneficent ends and that many nations might share equally in its blessings.

OUR CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

I.—ELVIRA B. SWIFT.

SEVERAL weeks ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invited its readers to send photographs and sketches of Christian workers who were quietly doing good work in Christ's cause without fee or reward. Many responses came to the invitation and the first of these we now publish.

Mrs. Elvira B. Swift is identified with the mission established on South Clark Street,

MRS. ELVIRA B. SWIFT.

Chicago, by the Central Baptist Church. The district is a notorious one and it has a record of a most unenviable character. The mission is surrounded by evil in a variety of shapes and it stands there like a light-house and life-saving station on a rocky coast to rescue the castaways. Every noon and night the Gospel is preached in its rooms and on Sundays there are several services. Beside this, there are meetings for special classes, for young girls, for mothers, for young men, etc. Mrs. Swift's particular department is the Wednesday afternoon meeting for women. There she has a field in which she has achieved great success. During the week Mrs. Swift is busy in the homes and haunts of the great parish, which is estimated to contain a hundred thousand souls. Wherever she can find an opportunity of directing a lost soul to the Saviour, whether on the street, in the waiting-room of a railroad station, or in some miserable lodging, there she preaches Christ to the sinner. It is a strange assemblage that meets her on the Wednesday afternoon at No. 324 South Clark Street. The people whose acquaintance she has made in her walks, and who have listened to the talks, come there to pray and sing and hear more of the Gospel from her lips. All are welcome, the drunkard, the vicious woman, the criminal, may all come. Mrs. Swift believes in Jesus as the Saviour of sinners, and knows that it was the lost that he came to save. No one can tell how many of her fallen sisters, how many ruined lives, how many hopeless cases, she has been the means of rescuing and guiding on the way back to honesty and purity. Nor does she limit her efforts to this one field. In the inquiry room after the regular meetings, her womanly tact, her motherly kindness, and her strong faith often touch hearts that have not been reached by the most eloquent speakers.

Mrs. Swift was converted in her youth. Her father, the Rev. P. P. Brown, was a famous Baptist minister in a small town of New York. Her husband, too, was a minister, so that she has always been in touch with Christian work. For some years she was Secretary of the Woman's Baptist Home Missionary Society, whose headquarters are in Chicago, and it was mainly through her efforts that the training School of the Society was organized. She has also been an active worker in the famous Pacific Garden Mission, conducted by Mrs. Clarke. There her large Bible Class for men grew to a congregation, and many were rescued and helped. Mrs. Swift is one of the best known workers in the district where she has labored many years, and her testimony is: "They are the happiest years of my life."

PETER AND THE RISEN LORD.

S. S. Lesson for June 16. John 21: 4-17. Golden Text John 21: 17. By Mrs. Baxter.

THE cross of Christ was already doing its work: disciples who, even at the last supper, had been striving with each other as to who should be the greatest, were now "together" at the sea of Tiberias in Galilee. Our flesh divides and separates, the flesh of Christ abolishes enmity and his cross reconciles what the flesh divides, and slays the enmity (Eph. 2: 15, 16). Whatever may have been their differences before, there had been so much of failure when they all forsook their Lord and fled, and so much of shame before the world, that they were classed with an executed criminal, that there was no room left for invidious comparisons. All of them had alike been unbelieving about his resurrection; not one had stood true to him out of all his chosen twelve. He had been left alone to be condemned and to suffer death. The cross is a low place, and the disciples were lower down in their own eyes and in the eyes of men around them than ever before; therefore contention among them ceased.

"I go a-fishing," said the restless, energetic Peter: and those who might have found fault with him once, and have reminded him how he had left his old vocation to follow him who most assuredly was risen again, now yield to him and say: "We also go with thee." But it was useless fishing. The Lord would not let an experiment succeed in the lives of those whose vocation was to wait for and obey his call. "That night they took nothing." When we are not sure of our way we do not take anything; we need to run, with patience enough to make sure of our steps "the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus" (Heb. 12: 2).

But the day broke, and with it Jesus stood, although unknown to them, upon the beach. There are in our spiritual experience, when, weaned from former experiences, we are not accustomed to new ones, and all looks dark. There is no conscious sin, but an intense shame for past sins and shortcomings, and the future is veiled. What is needed? Just what the disciples needed at the time, the power of the Holy Ghost as indwelling God. They had become so used to the voice, the form, the seen and felt presence of Jesus, that an unspeakable void was in their life. They had not yet learned to walk by faith, nor could they fully, until the Holy Ghost should come and take possession of them. "Children," said their unknown Lord, "have ye aught to eat?" "No," was the instant answer. "Cast the net on the right side of the ship and ye shall find." And they obeyed, and were unable now to ship the haul of fish which their nets contained. One among them understood. John, the beloved, said:

"It is the Lord."

Yes, day had broken, their work was no longer useless, all was changed; and their Lord was with them. And not only so, but he had made for them a tender and unexpected provision. From their useless heartless toil on the lake they come to find a fire of coals with meat and bread awaiting them on the shore. They were wont to serve Jesus, but this was a moment in which [illegible] was serving them as the real servant. [illegible] took to bring of the fish which they had just taken, he called them to come and eat. And yet they felt a [illegible] freedom with him. None of them durst ask him: "Who art thou?" They [illegible] at the presence of him who had passed through death. It was the Lord, and yet so different to the days of his flesh: and a solemn reserve possessed them. They had seen him before on the evening of the resurrection day, they had seen his hands and side, they were no more troubled and fears were not now arising in their hearts, and yet they were not entirely at their ease.

Something had yet to be brought to light and dealt with. But the Lord in his Shepherd love first strengthened his followers by this provision in the time of their listlessness. After they had eaten, Jesus saith to Simon Peter, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?" Oh, how the memory of Peter must have carried him back to that moment when his haunting fleshly heart had spoken out the vain boast: "Although all shall be offended, yet will not I." (Mark 14: 29). He could then compare himself with fellow disciples to his own advantage. But now?—"Lovest thou me more than these?" No reproach, no condemnation, but a question which searched him to the very foundation depths of his being. Before Peter could be the instrument used by the Holy Ghost at Pentecost, he must be brought face to face with realities about himself; he must know what was in his heart (Deut. 8: 2), that he might learn to lose all dependence upon himself, and lean only upon his God.

"Yea, Lord;" is his answer: "Thou knowest that I love thee." Hitherto Peter had been constituted a fisher of men (Matt. 4: 19): anyone who follows Jesus may be that, even from the moment of his conversion. But now, Peter was to be also

A Shepherd:

"Feed my lambs." No food for the lambs can come forth from a self-inflated heart: only one empty of self and filled with Christ, can feed the flock of God. "He saith unto him a second time: Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? He saith unto him: "Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee." He saith unto him: Tend my sheep, not the young ones only, but the grown ones also. "He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" Three times had Peter, the boasting Peter, denied his Lord, and before that, in his heart, which made such denial possible could be dealt with, the wound must be probed three times. But he was wounded to the quick, and answered, "Lord, thou knowest all things — Thou knewest the heart which could deny thee, thou knowest that heart now, thou art witness, Thou knowest that I love thee." It was no longer the boast of self-assurance, but an honest call to the closest inspection of the all-seeing eye of him who had prophesied his fall.

Having thus dealt with him, Jesus went on to explain the principles which should actuate him as a disciple of the Son of man: "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, When thou wast young, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest." This led to thy fall; thy strength was from self-girding. Peter must learn this lesson, and his impulsive energy must sink into the second place, and make way for the Holy Ghost, who should come and dwell in him. He must walk not whither he would, but learn to be led by the Spirit of God, that he might be one of the true sons of God. (Rom. 8: 12, R. V.) "When thou wast young thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest; but when thou shalt be old thou shalt stretch forth thy hands and another shall gird thee and carry thee whither thou wouldest not." Peter had professed to be ready for martyrdom, but his own girding did not suffice. Yet the offering of himself in sacrifice was not rejected, he should die a martyr death, but girded for his martyrdom by Another. "Now this he spake, signifying by what manner of death he should glorify God." Let us not lightly make an offering of ourselves to suffer for the Lord: He takes us at our word; but, may be, the kind of suffering, the martyrdom he chooses, may be anything but that which our valuation of ourselves would picture. It may be the martyrdom of a drunkard's wife, the breaking heart of a prodigal's mother, the constant wear of an unspiritual fellow-worker. The martyrdom for which God girds us is, as long as we have any will, just that which we would not.

John was following without being bidden, and Peter said: "Lord, what shall this man do?" "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee; follow thou me." How many there are who are hindered from following the Lord themselves by their inquisitiveness about others! The Lord has an individual leading for each one of his true disciples; we have enough to do to learn his will for ourselves, we may well leave others with him.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

BACK again among the familiar scenes of Galilee, the disciples awaited developments. They were there by Christ's command, and they waited for his will to be made known. Away from the busy metropolis and the scenes which would remind them of the recent painful events, they would be able to meditate on the past, in a region where every hill and valley, and the shores of the sea, would recall to their minds the teachings and miracles of their Lord. How often Jesus met them there and talked with them, we do not know, but the appearance described in the lesson was probably the first in Galilee. John speaks of it as the third time he showed himself, but he had already recorded three appearances, and must have meant that it was the third time he appeared to the whole band of disciples. Doubtless at this time they had no idea what their future was to be. Their hopes of a temporal kingdom had collapsed. Cleopas probably voiced the general opinion when he said in accents of disappointment, "We trusted that it had been he who should have redeemed Israel." Were they to consider this chapter of their lives closed? Must they go back to their old occupations, cowed and humiliated by the failure of their hopes? Or was it possible, as they asked Jesus later, that with this new, strange life in him, and with the power that such a miracle would give, he would now go on to establish the Kingdom? The fishing expedition described in the lesson may be an indication of their despair. Or, Peter may have suggested it merely as a diversion from a life of inactivity, which would be irksome to a man of his restless temperament. However it may be, they went. The night of fruitless toil, and the direction of Jesus from the shore as to the casting of the net, would remind them of that other time, when a similar incident occurred. The provision for a meal thus furnished, would also convince them that Jesus retained the power to maintain them, if they gave themselves to his service. The talk with Peter that followed the meal was a distinct call to labor. Three times he was asked in the presence of the others if he loved his Lord. There were no reproaches, but they all knew that he had thrice denied his Master, and he and they would understand the significance of the three questions. It was reproof administered with the utmost delicacy, but Peter was grieved. He appealed to Christ's knowledge, but that was not enough; he must make his public avowal. So it is still; the follower of Christ must confess him before men. So much is due to Christ, and he expects it. Each avowal was followed by the imposition of a duty. If Peter loved him, as he said, a way was pointed out to him in which he could prove his love. That is Christ's way. They who profess to love him must show that they do so by caring for others. His lambs, his sheep need care, need shepherding, need to be nourished. Those who love him l[illegible] this duty as a sacred trust. Thus gen[illegible] and tenderly, Peter was restored to [illegible] Apostleship.

Lovest thou me? Love to Jesus is [illegible] real basis of all genuine work for [illegible]. With that love in the heart no task [illegible] for him seems too menial or too hard. [illegible] true lover of him does not think of his [illegible] or his reputation. At a grand organ recital in a provincial church, a celebrated [illegible]poser was present in the organ loft. [illegible]ring the performance the organ-blower [illegible]as taken ill, and immediately the com[illegible]ser stepped forward, and took his place a[illegible] bellows, so that there was no break in [illegible] music. At the close of the perform[illegible]ce, some, who found out what had occ[illegible]ed, remonstrated with the composer for [illegible]ng such menial work. "Menial work," [illegible]ied he, "I love music so much that noth[illegible] I can do for it seems too menial."

More than these. Peter had said: "Th[illegible]gh all men should be offended because of [illegible]ee, yet will I never be offended." Christ s[illegible]ak-ing to him after his fall, delicately re[illegible]nds him of this boast, by asking him if he [illegible]ed him more than the other disciples did. "I remember," says a magazine writer, 'ad-ding in my boyhood a story that impr[illegible]sed me very much. I have forgotten all t[illegible] details, but its point was something like this: A boy was spending his vacation from school at his country home. His sis[illegible], a girl of twelve or thirteen, a year or two younger than himself, was jealous [illegible] his giving so much of his time to some b[illegible]s of the village much lower than himself [illegible] the social scale. 'You should be more with me,' she used to say to him. 'I am or ought to be more to you than those common ones.' At the end of the vacation, the boy was confronted with a problem. He had become rabbits that he was very proud of. He could not take them back to school with him, and he was troubled as to what he should do with them. His sister asked him what he had decided. He told her he was going to leave them in the charge of [illegible] village friends. Against this she protested [illegible] she would take care of them. The boy was reluctant to trust them to the care of girls, but finally, seeing that her feelings would be hurt by refusal, he yielded. Before the next vacation came around, all the rabbits had starved to death, forgotten by the girls who had contended for the charge of them. 'You boasted,' said her brother, 'how much more you were to me than those boys were, but they would not have let my rabbits starve to death.'"

Feed my sheep. Christ's sheep [illegible] found everywhere. He laid down [illegible] life for them, as he said. That fact makes every human being more precious. None ought to be despised. If the worst and poorest came to him, they might become his sheep and have his salvation. Dr. [illegible] was once about to conduct worship [illegible] the house of a Boer in Africa. The farmer's wife and six stalwart sons were seated round about, but the missionary [illegible] "Where are the servants?" "Oh, the Kaffirs! why, they're only dogs," was the reply. "But the dogs eat the crumbs that fall from the master's table," said the good man. A second and a third time he repeated this, and the master then said, "Bring the Kaffirs." Ten years afterwards [illegible] these Kaffirs saw Moffat, and running to him, told how that evening sermon had changed the lives of him and his friends.

Feed my lambs. The care of a child is [illegible] of the most sacred trusts that can be confided to anyone as parent or teacher. Christ loved children, and he speaks of them as his lambs. Peter was to show his love for his Master by feeding the lambs. Dr. Potter tells the story of a young man who stood at the bar of a court of justice to be sentenced for forgery. The judge had known him from a child, for his father had been a famous legal light whose works on legal topics were standards, and his most [illegible] work on "The Law of Trusts" was the most exhaustive work on the subject in existence. "Do you remember your father," asked the judge, sternly; "that father whom you have disgraced?" The prisoner expected this reproach from his father's old friend and his answer was read. "I remember him perfectly," he said. "When I went to him for advice, or to ask him any question, he would look from his book on 'The Law of Trusts,' and say, 'Run away, boy, I am busy; don't bother me.' My father finished his book and he [illegible] I am." The great lawyer had neglected his own trust with awful results.

ONE TOO VILE FOR SAVING.

e Work of the "Whosoever Gospel Mission," at Germantown—Hands ever Ready to Lift Up the Fallen.

IN THE BROOM-SHOP OF THE "WHOSOEVER MISSION."

HRISTIAN work in the United States within a decade has greatly broadened and intensified. Not that Christianity itself has been widened, but our apprehension of it, as well as our comprehension . have been enlarged. As our concep- of the Fatherhood of God has grown ore adequate, the idea of the brotherhood man has been liberalized and ennobled, til "our brother" has come to mean the mp, the criminal, the drunkard, the dis- lute, the shiftless, the incompetent, and our sponsibility, has come to be recognized as ving a deeper and more practical meaning. Within the church, one of the signs of is change is the visible, growing tendency assert that religion is concerned with an's actual state in this world as well as th his possible state in the next. But is more sweeping horizon has not stopped th an acknowledgment or an assertion of is truth, but has resulted in practical, fruit- l effort, and the application of new meth- s, agencies and plans. One of the most icient of these "new departures," in hristian work, is the Whosoever Gospel ission and Rescue Home in Germantown, e beautiful and historic suburb of Phila- lphia. Starting with a clear, definite idea the work to be done, profound faith in d, and earnest prayer, as its only capital, is mission has accomplished wonderful sults. It is unique, in that it has been nducted by faith—nothing has been done cept as it seemed by Divine sanction and rection, and everything that has come to e mission,—whether in the way of help as results,—can generally be seen to have en an answer to prayer.

When the work was first started three ars ago, in what had been a saloon, it as confined to Gospel meetings with good usic, thrilling testimonies and pointed, rnest prayers. Many a poor fellow there und peace in believing. But it was soon und that creature comforts were as essen- l as Gospel hymns, and the Rescue ome, cheap meals, lodging-house, wood- rd and various industries came by a very atural evolution.

As opportunities and needs increased, the anagers and workers laid them before od in prayer, and thus friends and means ultiplied. And, all the while, the hearts those interested in the enterprise were eered by the most gratifying results—re- lts clear beyond the power of any human ead or hand. At length the quarters in e row on Germantown Road, were out- own, though several rooms had been add- , one after another. Then there came a iance to buy a large textile mill, and this is been turned into one of the most com- te Rescue Missions in the United States. In the basement floor is the "Shelter oom," where any poor tramp is received. hen there are the engine and boiler room nd the machinery for splitting and sawing e kindling wood, in which the mission es quite a thriving trade. Quarters for e horses and wagons, owned and con- stantly used by the mission, are also found on this floor. On the next floor are the office, meeting-room, dining-room and kitchen. Ascending another flight of steps brings one to the dormitory and bath-rooms, and above that is the work-room, where brooms and carpets are made, and shoes, stoves and chairs, etc., are repaired. There is also a disinfecting room connected with the Mission.

Now, take your stand at the door of the home, on Bowman street. Here comes a miserable tramp, destitute of everything, even a character. What can be done for him? The mission takes this outcast and says to him: "Here is a home; here is food: but you must work for it. This is not charity; it is help for the helpless who cannot help themselves. There is the labor shop; go and work and then come and get a meal and lodgings. There is the bath-room; go and have a good wash. Here is the meeting; go in and enjoy the service. The singing is inspiriting, the testimonies are helpful and there are those who will pray for you, and make you comfortable, and give you a word of counsel. Stay here and prove you are in earnest, and we'll help you to a permanent situation. We have given this chance to scores as low down as you are, and they became men again. Remember, we don't offer you charity; we want to give you a chance."

The Mission aims to go farther and give "out-door relief"—that is, to reach and help the tramp who doesn't come to the mission, but goes begging from door to door. Tickets are distributed, and when a beggar comes, he is given one and sent to the Mission and made to earn a breakfast, and, thus happily, is brought under influences that may work a reform.

Of the good that has been accomplished in this Mission, it is impossible to speak adequately. It has lifted up and restored to manhood scores of those who were burdens on society, and some are now not only supporting themselves, but their wives and families. Some who were separated from their families and friends through sin, have been happily re-united to them, and are now living sober and reputable lives in the fear of the Lord. Not a few successful Christian business men date the beginning of their better career to the time when they were aided by the "Whosoever Mission." One who was redeemed is now holding a responsible position in a city institution; another is in a wholesale grocery house; a third is a successful clothing merchant; still another is a salesman in a large house in New York, while others are engaged in various lines of business. One who had been in the House of Correction twice, is now filling a respectable situation very creditably. The Assistant Superintendent of the Home, who was separated from his family for seven years, is now living with them happily in a well-furnished house. These are only a few out of many instances that might be named, if space permitted.

Since the "Whosoever Home" was started on January 18, 1893, 92,000 meals have been furnished; 1174 persons have been permanently lodged, and places have been found for 306. There have been numerous conversions. The Home is incorporated, and is managed by a Board of Directors, made up of gentlemen from the different churches, and they have the efficient co-operation of a Ladies' Auxiliary. The executive officers are a Superintendent and Assistant Superintendent. Mr. Wm. Raws, the Superintendent, is a reformed man. He was converted at the Mills' revival meetings in Germantown, a few years ago. Filled with the idea of saving others, he established and has been able to develop this mission work. He is intensely in earnest, and has the faculty of reaching and holding fallen men in an unusual degree. He has been markedly successful in enlisting others in the work. More than all, he has a simple, child-like faith in God, that never doubts, but waits and works. His assistant, John R. McIntire, is a product of the Home and a very important factor in the work. Both the Superintendent and the Assistant are always busy, and often the day does not seem long enough for their tasks. Many workers come from other missions to inspect the Home, and the general verdict is that it is a most unique and wonderful establishment. It has the full endorsement of the local ministers and workers in the churches, and the interest never flags. Its efforts have been already blessed in restoring many shattered lives and guiding a large number of wandering souls into the kingdom.

IN THE KINDLING-WOOD FACTORY

RESTING IN THE "SHELTER."

HOW A HERO DIED.

From one of the battle-fields of China and Japan comes a touching story of the heroism of a little Japanese drummer boy. A Japanese force had become panic-stricken and were retreating before the Chinese when the little bugler fell mortally wounded. Stricken and dying as he was, the brave lad did not forget his duty. He saw their troops flying and quickly discerned that their terror and panic were really groundless. With splendid courage he raised himself, and grasping his bugle, sounded a loud and stirring "charge;" the troops heard it and rallied under its message, charged valiantly, and the day was theirs. But the little bugler had died as they fought, and did not even know that his effort had been successful. His comrades knew, however, what he had done, and they bore him from the field in triumph; and already the "uta," a poem of honor, has been written in his memory, while his mother has arrayed herself in robes of state and honor, and wound her hair with flowers, the proudest woman in the empire, that her only son should have thus distinguished himself. Such splendid courage recalls the experiences of those grand Christian martyrs who, even while their lives were ebbing away, bravely sounded the tocsin of spiritual triumph, and with their last breath urged on the soldiers of the Cross in their great battle against sin.

THE GOSPEL IN ASIA MINOR.

"In Asia Minor," writes a missionary of wide experience, "the Mohammedans are seeking the Word of God, but hiding it for fear of persecution. One man bought the Scriptures in Spanish, and took the trouble to learn that language in order that he might read the precious book understandingly. Another walked a hundred miles, and paid $1.50 for a copy, all he could spare from a year's work. The Syro-Phœnician woman in our Lord's time was a monument of faith. But another of her nationality reappeared in the land of the Canaanites. She walked all the way from this Canaanitish land to Latakia and asked Dr. Metheny to remove a tumor. He told her that she would probably die, and that her people would blame him. She said: 'No, I am a Christian, and many believe as I do. A pupil from your school went home and took a company of women into the woods and told them that there was a salvation for women, and that Jesus Christ died for them, and many believed. Take it away, doctor, I am not afraid to die.' After the operation she did die, passing away with rejoicings on her lips."

A UNBELIEVER ABASHED.

On one occasion, while Sir Isaac Newton, was examining a new and particularly fine globe, a visitor entered his study. This caller, as Sir Isaac knew, had often expressed his disbelief in the existence of a God and his conviction that the world and its surroundings were the result of evolution or chance. He was greatly pleased with the handsome globe, and asked: "Who made it?" "Nobody," answered Sir Isaac; "it just happened here." The man looked up in amazement at the answer, but he soon understood what it meant. Who can say that this beautiful and wonderful world came by chance, when he knows that there is not a house, or ship, or picture, or anything in it but has had a maker. The logic of the great philosopher was conclusive, and the infidel was completely silenced.

NATURAL RELIGION.

THE recent disasters on both sides the sea show that the elements of nature are merciless. Men in our times say nature is enough. The sunshine and the refreshing flower and the beautiful flora of garden and field are all they want for a religion. They learn from the natural world God is love. The volume of nature is all they need for divine revelation. But what of the recent floods? How can the naturalist find any mercy in them? They whelm a human life with no more commiseration than they feel when they float the log of a sawmill. They have no more pity for a drowned man or woman or child than for a muskrat. They look at the bereavement of a household with no more emotion than they would at seeing two planks parted. The floods have voices, but not one of the drops of the overflowing torrents has a tear in it save the tear of human anguish. Poetically we speak of the rain as the weeping of the clouds, and the wind among the tree-branches as a sigh of sympathy, and the heavens as veiled in mourning at some great disaster, but it is only a poetical figure. The clouds thunder and strike, but they never weep. The winds howl, but they never give sympathetic sigh. The sun will shine as brightly on the wrecked homesteads and the graves of these terrible casualties as though there had been no dirge and no heartbreak along all the swollen waters. Nature can smite as with lightning, can rend apart as by earthquake, can eat up as by locusts, can prostrate as by malarial sickness, can blind the eye as by explosion, can cripple the limb as by falling rock, can dethrone the reason as by a blow on the brain, but it cannot pity. It can blast, it can cut, it can scorch, it can grind, it can lacerate, it can consume, it can drown, but it cannot pity. If all those sufferers from the freshets had knelt in the mud and slush, and prayed, saying, "Oh, ye clouds, stop raining! Oh, ye floods, hush your voice! Stand back from my homstead! Spare my hard-earned fortune! Save my drowning wife and child!" the only answer would have been continued plash of rain, continued gurgle of waters, continued crash of falling farmhouses, continued bleat and bellowing of perishing flocks and herds. Oh, the world wants more than a religion of flowers, a religion of sunshine, a religion of art, for such religions fail when the floods of disaster lift up their voices.

I have of only one religion that comes in and offers better riches than the floods can take, better life than that which expired under the roiled waters, and a future explanation, grand, glorious and satisfactory, of things we cannot understand now. This old religion, old but not superannuated. Old but not emeritus, it works to-day as well as it ever worked along the Jordan and the Euphrates. It is revealed religion that comes in to fill up the awful gap in natural religion. You can have your religion of sunshine, but give me the religion for all weathers. You can have your religion of daisies, buttercups and daffodils, and morning larks and robin-redbreasts, but give me a religion that, while fully appreciative of the brightness of this world, shows its mightiest power when the lights have gone out by submergence of gas-houses, and whole villages are unanchored, and that can plant its foot on an all-sweeping inundation, crying: "The Lord sitteth upon the flood, the Lord is mightier than many waters, an ever-present help, though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake by the swelling thereof." I would not give a five-cent nickel for all the comfort of all the religions that were ever hatched out of the human skull or came up as malaria from the pit. I want a religion that cannot only sail a smooth river at noon, when all the paddle-wheels drop opals, and emeralds, and sapphires, and all the sails are white as wings of sea-gulls, but a religion that can calmly ride a midnight freshet. Paul's religion of the dungeon, John's religion of tempest-lashed Patmos, Daniel's religion of the lockjawed lion.

LOOK AT HOME.

THE Church saith in Canticles: "They have made me the keeper of vineyards, but my own vineyard have I not kept." So there are a great many Christians now who spend their chief time in looking after others, while their own vineyard goes to waste. They are raising very fine grapes on the other side of the fence, but the property does not belong to them, nor the grapes. We know Christians who are lean as skeletons in religious experience, who are running hither and thither, looking after Sunday Schools, calling conventions, attending meetings. They are in everlasting ferment about other people, but have no anxiety about themselves. They cut the wool off somebody else's sheep, and spin it on somebody else's wheel, and weave it on somebody else's loom, for somebody else's back. Meanwhile, their own souls are shivering to death

So there are women busy collecting money for benevolent institutions and managing public affairs, while their own children go with faces unwashed, and stockings undarned, and minds uneducated, and souls unsaved. Busy everywhere but in their own vineyard.

Now, the first thing for one to do is to take care of his or her own heart. How was it that the old saints, with less opportunity than we have, were better men? They had more time for contemplation. Christians now seldom sit down to think It is drive, and push, and pull. Their only quiet time is when they are on an express train going at forty miles an hour, watch in hand, wondering why they don't go sixty. Just before communion they feel called upon for special self-examination, and so take the ten minutes in which they are walking to church to think what miserable offenders they have been. Now, you have no right to give so much time to your neighbors' crops that you let your own suffer. Beside, if our own piety be thin, our work will be inefficient. If we have been much with Christ, and have deep personal experiences, we will do more good in one month than with a shallow experience we could do in ten years. One-half the Christian effort of to-dav is mere gab. The world sees straight through it. While some man who says but little, yet feels much, gets hold of the heart of an audience, and rouses, and melts, and subdues, and agonizes it at will. Rickety and unsafe machinery always makes a great racket. Christians seeking no advancement in personal piety are often very demonstrative, as steamboats at the wharf blowing off steam are so noisy you cannot hear yourself speak.

Friends! the Lord of the vineyard will after awhile appear at the gate. The day of vintage will come. When the grapes in olden times were gathered, there was sporting through all the land, and the sound of musical instruments. What kind of clusters shall we be able to show, at last, in our vineyard? Will they be stunted and sour, or ripe and large? If faithful in the planting, and the trimming, and the watching, the vintage will be glorious. Let the messengers of God put the full clusters into the wine-press, and then, with all the banqueters of heaven, the instruments chorded to the right pitch, we will drink new wine in our Father's kingdom. God forbid that ours should be the lamentation: "They made me the keeper of vineyards, but my own vineyard have I not kept."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

The management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contemplate the addition of a new and very interesting department, and as the low subscription price of the paper does not admit of permanent enlargement, it will be necessary, in order to make room for the new department, to temporarily drop some one of the present features of the paper. Will such of our readers as are interested kindly send us a postal card stating which department they consider would be least missed from the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? The selection of the department to be dropped should be made from the following list:

Sermon, Sunday School Lesson, Silhouettes from Life, Editorial, MAIL-BAG, Bible and Newspaper, Family and Home Circle, Music, Young People's Societies, Prophecy, and Serial Story.

Subscriber, Cooperstown, N. Y. What were considered the "Seven Wonders of the world?"

They were: the Pyramids, the Rhodian Colossus, the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, the Hanging Gardens of Babylon, the Statue of Jupiter Olympius, the Mausoleum of Artemisia, and the Pharos of Alexandria.

B. H. E., White Plains, N. Y. In what constellation is the star Alcyone, and why do some think Heaven is situated there? How is Alcyone pronounced?

Alcyone (pronounced "Al-ke-o-ne,") is in the starry cluster of the Pleiades, and is the brightest in the group. Alcyone is declared by some astronomers to be the central star of a great system and this statement has probably given rise to the suggestion that it may be the abode reserved for the redeemed human race.

F. Please say in your paper the sum necessary to become a patron of the Bowery Mission.

It is left for the patrons themselves to decide the extent of the interest they wish to take in the work. It is the oldest Gospel Mission of the kind in the country and its work has been richly blessed in the past and is constantly and wonderfully growing. Give us your prayers at all times, and send your gift once a year, making it liberal in proportion as the work has been laid upon your heart.

L. L. G. Woodstock, Ont. 1. What becomes of idolaters who die without hearing the Gospel? 2. Do the souls of believers go directly to heaven at death? 3. Will Christ reign personally on earth during the Millennium?

1. We have nothing to do with the question. Their future is in the hands of God. Our plain duty is to preach the Gospel to them. If God has any way of saving such people after death, he has not revealed it to us. 2. There is no direct statement in the Bible on the subject. Some passages, however, imply that there is no interval. One of these, and probably the most pertinent, is Phil. 1: 23, where Paul expresses the desire to depart and to be with Christ. We cannot imagine a man so intensely earnest wishing for death, if he did not expect that at death he would go immediately into the presence of his Lord. There are other passages, too, from which the same inference may be drawn. Christ's promise to the thief on the cross that "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise" (Luke 23: 43), is one of these. 3. That appears to us to be the plain teaching of the Scriptures. (See Rev. 20: 4, and many other passages.)

Earnest Seeker, Canada. I have long had doubts of my acceptance with God. I made a profession of faith some years ago, but I make no progress, and have not that love for reading the Bible that I ought to have. Is it my duty to give up religion?

No, anything rather than that. You are probably, like many others, making the mistake of fixing your thoughts on yourself and your own condition rather than on God. There is no one more likely to become sick and nervous than he who counts the beats of his pulse and watches his condition for symptoms of disease. You should act reasonably in religion as in other matters. You are assured that if you believe on Christ and trust in him, he will save you. If you accept that offer, then you may be sure that God will fulfil his promise. Your next duty is to struggle to be quit of sin, and live as a man who is saved ought to live. If you are in earnest about this you will soon have enough to occupy your attention. You will be driven to your Bible and to prayer for help and will soon love and treasure them. You should also try to follow Christ's example in doing good. Get some drunkard to give up drink; teach some neglected child about Christ; go and visit some poverty-stricken man, and deny yourself some luxury that you may help him. You will be surprised to find how much good you may do. Do not worry about the evidences of your own salvation but try to benefit some one else.

Mrs. S. L. V. B., Newark, N. J. 1. How far was Padan-Aram from Beer-sheba? 2. How old was Rebekah when Eliezer met her? 3. Did he travel over the same route, and how long time probably take him to go afoot?

1. Beer-sheba was in Southern Palestine on the edge of the wilderness of Judea, while the City of Nahor" is believed by commentators to have been Haran, about fourteen miles east of Damascus. As the crow flies, the distance is about 200 miles, but the tortuous mountain and valley roads made it about 450 miles. 2. The age of Rebekah is not stated. 3. Jacob, all probability, followed the same route when he journeyed to Abraham's native country in later years.

C. S. Smith, Blocton, Ala. 1. Who was the [illegible] mentioned in various parts of the Gospels "not Iscariot"? 2. How many times was Christ tried?

1. He is called by Mark, Thaddeus, and by Matthew, Lebbeus. Luke (6: 16, and Acts 1: 13) includes him in his list of apostles but the name of Judas. It is disputed whether he was brother, half-brother, or cousin, of our Lord. There seems to be no doubt that he was closely related to him. He is doubtless the author of the Epistle of Jude in the New Testament. 2. There was only one actual trial, if it can be called a trial. The Sanhedrin, Caiaphas the High Priest, presiding, had him arraigned before it and decided the case. The hearing before Pilate was simply an application for his ratification of sentence. The Jews rested Pilate's going into the case at all. The arraigning before Annas was preliminary and informal.

"Undeceived," Chesapeake City, Md. 1. Is membership in a Christian Endeavor Society equivalent to Church membership as a confession of Christ? 2. Would it be right to unite with a church if one does not believe in every article of its creed?

1. It is to a certain extent a confession of Christ; but it is rather a supplement to and a substitute for, church-membership. The Society was not intended to take the place of the church, but to be a number of Christians united together for united Christian effort. It would be well to frankly state the fact in applying for admission, so that the connection may be mutually agreeable, if it is made and no objection is made by the church, and the difference is not radical, there is nothing wrong in uniting with a church whose creed you do not accept in its entirety. If, as you say, you do not know of any church with a creed in which you do believe, why not join the Congregational Church, in which the utmost liberty is allowed?

Fannie E Crewe, Mass. Is there any command given after the resurrection of Christ to keep Sunday or any day holy?

The New Testament does not mention any explicit command being given after the resurrection. From the early Christian writers we learn that the observance of the Lord's Day was universal in the Church. It was not observed, however, as the Jewish Sabbath with restrictions and penalties and with minute regulations as to what should, and should not be done on that day, but as a day on which Christians met together to praise and pray, to celebrate the Lord's Supper and enjoy communion with God, and with each other. Some Jewish converts wanted to compel the Gentiles to keep Saturday holy, according to the Jewish law, as some people are trying to do still; but the Apostle Paul wrote that they need give no heed to such teachers, and to let no man judge them as to the Sabbath. (Col. 2: 16. If a man's heart is right he will voluntarily keep the Lord's Day holy with more care than if it were under the most stringent law.

FLORENCE SHAKEN.

BEAUTIFUL Florence, the famous Italian city on the Arno, the treasury of masterpieces of painting and sculpture, has found that nature pays no respect to it on account of its ancient prestige or its artistic renown. The earthquake vich, on May 18, shook it to its foundatis made the people think that their splenc city was about to be swallowed up. It vs late in the evening when the first trer was felt. It passed through the city, al its nature was instantly recognized. A rre severe shock followed almost instant- Houses swayed like ships in a gale at s and many roofs fell in. THE CITY OF FLORENCE, RECENTLY SHAKEN BY EARTHQUAKE.

ants a New Brain.

A man was arrested last week in New rk who has been causing a good deal of noyance. He has been addressing letters posing marriage to a number of respectle ladies, with whom he had not the ghtest acquaintance. The letters were oherent, and were evidently written by deranged man. The majority did not en give the address to which an answer ght be sent. They were piteous appeals the person addressed to marry the writer, d by so doing save his reason and his e. After considerable trouble, the police succeeded in finding the writer, who was living with his parents in Harlem. The parents said that he had been insane for two years, but they had not sent him to an asylum as he was harmless and they could control him. He was quite conscious of his aberration of mind, and of late has been imbued with the idea that he would get a new brain, or a share of one, if he married a sensible girl. He had, therefore, written a number of proposals of marriage, which they had been unable to intercept. The man was committed to Bellevue for treatment. If he is cured, he will realize, as sane people do, that a new brain cannot be obtained by marriage. But if, with recovered reason, he should happily be brought to realize his need of a new heart, he will find that the way to obtain it is by union with Christ of which marriage is a type.

A new heart will I give you and a new spirit will I put within you Ezek 36. 26.

Fraudulent Marking.

A sensation was produced in the Grand Jury room in New York on May 23 by an accusation of ten of the most prominent dry-goods houses in the city of selling goods that were not what they were represented as being. An information had been laid by an expert in silver, which the Assistant District Attorney presented to the Grand Jury. The expert had purchased from the firms in question, articles purporting to be genuine silver, bearing the stamp, "Sterling," or "Coin Silver." He had sent all the articles to the Assay Office of the United States Mint, and submitted the assayer's report on each. Of thirty-two articles sent in, only one proved to be of the standard justifying the stamp; only five approached it; the majority contained only a minute portion of silver; while several were nothing but brass. It appears that according to law, no article should bear a stamp representing it as silver, if it contains alloy to the extent of more than a thirteenth of its weight. So much alloy is allowed, to give the silver the hardness requisite for working, but if any more is mixed with the precious metal, it is there for the purpose of diminishing its value, and the article should no longer be called silver. The firms who sold the articles protest that, as they did not put the stamp on the articles, they were innocent, and were as much deceived as their customers were. It remains for the courts to decide whether they are culpable or not. The really guilty parties are evidently those who put the stamp on the articles. Although it appears to be right to stamp an article as silver that contains some portion of alloy, an article ought not to bear the stamp of silver if there is more alloy than silver in its composition. It is so with character. The cause of Christ in the world has suffered a great deal of reproach through persons posing as Christians, and bearing the certificate of church-membership, who have more worldliness than spirituality in their nature and lives.

If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his. (Rom. 8: 9.)

To Liberate a White Slave.

An expedition is being organized by James J. Coyle, a citizen of California for the rescue of Charles Neufeld, a relative, who has been a slave of the Mahdi, in the Soudan, for eight years. Neufeld was a German merchant who, in 1887, accompanied an expedition to the interior of Africa, with the hope of opening up a trade with the Arabs for ostrich feathers. The expedition was attacked at Selimeh by the Mahdi's troops, the majority of the men were killed, and the others, including Neufeld, were sent as prisoners to Dongola. The Mahdi believed him to be an English Pasha and ordered him to instant execution. Neufeld, however, had papers with him proving him to be a German subject, and the Mahdi, having no special grudge against Germans, spared his life. He was not allowed to depart, but was made a slave. A heavy iron ring was forged around his ankle to prevent his running away and as a badge of servitude. For a long time he was kept in a wretched prison at Omdurman, where he would have starved to death but for the kindness of some Europeans, who supplied him with food. About three years ago his lot improved. The Mahdi decided to manufacture his own gunpowder, and employed Neufeld to superintend the preparation of the saltpetre at Khartoum. His fetter, however, was not removed, and he was still subject to the brutal treatment of the overseers. The Europeans who have escaped have brought deplorable accounts of Neufeld's sufferings, and will be glad to aid in any attempt to rescue him. They do not, however, conceal the fact that the hazard of the undertaking will be extreme and may result in the enslavement or death of the rescuers. In spite of the warning, Mr. Coyle is determined to make the attempt, and is preparing to lead a party to the Soudan for the purpose. If his enslaved relative should hear of the expedition we can imagine how grateful he will be, and how anxious he will be that no harm shall happen to his rescuer, and what efforts he will make to facilitate the attempt. Yet when people hear from the pulpit how Christ came down to earth and laid down his life to deliver men from an infinitely worse bondage, too many listen unmoved, and do not avail themselves of the deliverance he achieved.

In whom we have redemption through his blood. Eph. 1: 7.

BRIEF NOTES.

An International Exchange of Pulpits is Arranged. Dr. Lorimer, of Boston, goes to London to preach in Dr. Pentecost's church at Marylebone, and Dr. Pentecost comes to New York to preach for Dr. John Hall.

An English Journal Publishes the Following statistics: There is one Christian minister for every 900 persons in Great Britain, one for every 114,000 in Japan, one for every 165,080 in India, one for every 222,000 in Africa, and one for every 437,000 in the great Chinese Empire.

A Band of Seventy Believers Has For Some years been praying for the overthrow of the Casino, the great European gambling house of Monte Carlo. For twenty-nine years it was only shut for one day—that on which the old prince died. It is to be closed for four months this summer on account of diminished profits.

The Rev. E. H. Stokes, D.D., President of the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Association, has made public the official programme of services for the summer. The opening service will be held June 30, and the great Camp Meeting will begin Monday, August 19, and continne for ten days.

Rev. B. Fay Mills has been holding united services at Westfield, Mass. The interest aroused was so hopeful that the meetings were continued for three weeks; Rev. Ralph Gillam taking charge when Mr. Mills was called away. The churches of the town of all denominations have all received large accessions from the services.

A Bible Conference will be held at Old Point Comfort Va., June 11-18. There will be three sessions each day in the Hygeia Hotel. Among the speakers who will take part will be Revs. A. C. Dixon of Brooklyn; George C. Needham; R. G. Pearson; W. J. Erdman of Philadelphia; J. M. Stifler of Chester, Pa.; W. G. Moorehead of Xenia, O., and Dr. Seiss of Philadelphia. All information about board, etc., may be obtained from the Secretary, Y. M. C. A., Hampton, Va., or at the Hygeia Hotel.

A Press Dispatch from Murphysboro, Ill., states that two prisoners under sentence of death were baptized in the river there They were chained together and had fetters on their feet. Two Baptist evangelists who had labored with them in prison and had led them to make profession of faith, officiated at the ceremony. The sheriff, with an armed guard, was in attendance and a great crowd assembled to witness the novel spectacle.

The Statistics of the Last year of work by the American Bible Society show that the issues of Bibles, Testaments, and portions amounted to 1,581,128, of which 735,221 were circulated in foreign lands. The issues of the Society during the seventy-nine years of its existence amount to 59,955,558 copies.

It is Estimated that the Protestant Churches of America, Great Britain, and Europe are represented in their work for other lands by 9,000 missionaries and more than 50,000 native workers, and have expended during the past year about $12,500,000.

A Visitor to the State Insane Asylum at Warm Springs, Mont., writes that reading matter is very much needed by many of the inmates, and if Christians would send their religious papers and magazines, old or new, to the superintendent, they would be greatly appreciated.

The National Christian Citizenship League, whose offices are at 153 La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill., urgently begs ministers of all denominations to preach special sermons on the duties of citizenship, and the need to make Christian principles operative in public affairs, on Sunday, June 30. This day being the Sunday preceding the national anniversary, is particularly appropriate for such lessons.

The Evangelistic Meetings Conducted at Crawfordsville, Ind., by Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and P. P. Bilhorn have been very successful. They were held in a large tents, and were largely attended. The congregation on Sunday evening, May 12, was estimated to number four thousand persons. Several hundred persons made profession of faith. The two evangelists have gone to Ottumwa, Iowa.

The Fortieth Annual Convention of the New York State Sunday School Association will be held at Saratoga on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, June 11, 12, and 13. The convention will be held in the First M. E. Church, the largest church building in that city. The programme ensures one of the most profitable gatherings in the history of the Association, many noted Sunday School workers from all parts of the Union being announced to take part in the deliberations. Communications as to rooms at the hotels and boarding houses should be made to Col. D. F. Ritchie, Saratoga, N. Y. Reduced rates have been secured on all railroads for distances on which the fare is over seventy-five cents. All information may be obtained of Mr. Timothy Hough, Syracuse, N. Y.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE WONDERFUL FOUNTAIN.

Sermon preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, by Robert Stuart MacArthur. Text: Zech 13: 1 "In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and uncleanness."

WE can see much poetic beauty and religious significance in the frequent allusions in Scripture to wells, springs and fountains; but to see all in the words which an inhabitant of the East saw, we would need to be familiar with the heat, the languor, the treeless wastes, the barren deserts and the burnt pastures, which are common in oriental lands. In eastern countries water is a luxury. Charles Kingsley reminds us that there is no picture so beautiful as that of the well dug long ago by the hands of pious patriarchs, whither the maidens go at eventide to water their flocks, when some strong hand has moved away the stone. Beautiful also is the picture of the springing fountain under the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, with its oasis of greenness, its groves of beauty, its songsters making melody in the air, and its streams of flowing water giving life to drooping plants, panting animals and wearied travelers. Thus it was that both in the language of Scripture and of legendary story, water came to have a mystical and religious meaning. The wild dreams of an imaginative people told of a Fountain of hidden somewhere out of the reach of ordinary mortals. It was supposed to be a gift of the gods, which was carefully guarded through their jealousy of men. It was believed, however, that by toil and sorrow, by patience in suffering and perseverance in seeking, it might be found. Perhaps it was hidden amid trackless mountains, guarded by demons; perhaps amid the rich glades of tropical climes, but somewhere it was, and sometime it would be found. Some even pretended to have made the great discovery. I have read in an Eastern story of the manner in which the discovery was made. After patient toil and earnest prayer on the part of men, the gods became propitious. They revealed the place of concealment. A talismanic word overcame the perpetual guardian. The treasure was found and its wonderful virtues proved. The story goes on to tell that the news spread with great rapidity; that the sick, the blind, the halt and the old flocked to this wonderful fountain; that approaching it all classes and forms of disease might be seen; but that coming from it none were old, none were feeble, none were diseased, none were sad. At its marvellous touch, age disappeared and youth returned; hard and wrinkled faces became soft and smooth; bowed forms became erect, and youth, beauty and immortality were again granted to men. According to the fanciful story in was indeed a marvellous fountain; it gave joy to the whole country.

The Dream of the Ages became a glorious reality; the gods had smiled and men rejoiced. Among its other wonderful properties there was this one—one of the most wonderful of all—wherever a few drops of the water were taken and poured out, there immediately a similar fountain would be seen. And so, says the story, it came to be known as "The Wonderful Fountain."

But I have heard of a more wonderful [illegible] to the house of David for sin and uncleanness." I have seen in this fountain the actual gifts of God far outnumber and outstrip the dreamy imaginations of men. I have seen truth stranger far than fiction—God giving more and better things than man's fancy could desire or divine. Christ tells the woman of Samaria that the water [illegible] in a sense, a fountain-head of water to slake the thirst of others. The world of wonder is the world of God's truth in opening this fountain. It is a fountain which gives joy without sorrow, good without evil, and life without death. This is surely beyond all comparison "The Wonderful Fountain." Such a fountain is that brought to our notice in my text. Permit me to point out a few particulars in respect to which this is a wonderful fountain.

In the first place, it is wonderful in its origin. The idea of this fountain originated in heaven. It is not of the earth earthly; it is from the Lord in heaven. Earthly fountains could not wash away sins; impurity cannot cleanse impurity. But God's love for men's souls and God's hatred for men's sins originated a fountain which can make the vilest clean. In one sense this fountain was always flowing, for Christ was the Lamb slain from before the foundation of the world, but in another sense it was a sealed fountain. The saints of God in olden time trusted in God's promise that a fountain would be opened. On the bare Word of God their faith reposed. By faith they saw in the coming years the flowing fountain, and by faith they were already cleansed within.

This faith resting on the Word of God was encouraged in its exercise by significant types and symbols. These were nothing in themselves, but they were symbolic and prophetic of great truths to be revealed. Christ was always the end of the law for righteousness to all who truly believed. All these prophecies pointed to him for their fulfillment. Sinai was to give place to Calvary. Sinai's storm was to be hushed and its thunder stilled

At the Cross of Christ.

There law and Gospel were to clasp hands; there mercy and truth were to meet together; there righteousness and peace were to kiss each other. As the symbols of the Lord's supper keep before our minds constantly the great sacrifice which has been made, so the morning and evening sacrifice kept before the minds of pious Hebrews the great sacrifice which was to be made. Faith often needs the support of sight; and faith was thus helped by gazing on the bleeding victim and the smoking sacrifice of the Old Testament ritual.

But the fountain was not yet really opened. How was it to be opened? Shall God send an angel to perform this needed service? Shall there be heard seraphic voices proclaiming through the universe that a fountain is opened for sin and for uncleanness? God will do something far more wonderful than if he were to adopt either of these plans. He will send his only begotten Son, full of grace and truth, to be and to open the wonderful fountain. We have heard the old story of this wonderful redemption; a story old as the Garden of Eden, a story new as the last ray of sunshine that fell upon our faces. In the fulness of time Christ came; was born of a woman, and was made under the law that he might redeem those who were under the law. Men and angels stood in wonder and adoration at the manger of Bethlehem.

The years pass. Fountains of power are opened—power over nature goes forth, and power over the wild passions of the human soul is displayed, and the maniac among the tombs is seen restored, clothed and in his right mind, sitting at Jesus' feet. Power over the dead is manifested, and Lazarus is restored to his rejoicing sisters and wondering friends. Fountains of grace, of sweetness, of gentleness, of purity, and of love were opened; but, O my soul, where is where is the blood that can wash the soul and make it whiter than snow? Where is the wonderful tree which placed in the Marahs of earth can change them into waters of sweetness and healthfulness for body and soul? We have an old tale to tell you. It is the story of Gethsemane; it is the story of Calvary. He who knew no sin is made sin for us that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. The sinless Saviour becomes the substitute for sinful men. The Just One dies for unjust men that they may be brought to God. The holy One bears our sins in his own body on the tree. Our terrible guilt required an infinite expiation; our awful debt needed divine wisdom and righteousness for its full payment. The Lamb of God dies to take away the sin of the world. See the Christ as he bows his head upon his breast! Hear him, as he exclaims, "It is finished!" See the Roman soldier as he pierces the Christ to the heart. Watch the flowing, and water! The wonderful fountain is opened; the cleansing stream flows from the throne of God. Truly this is "The Wonderful Fountain."

Cleansing Blood

It may be observed, in the second place, that it is a Wonderful Fountain also in the fulness and freeness of its supplies. God's love is an ocean boundless and bottomless. The grace of God is a stream which flows through all the ages with undiminished fulness. The virtues of this cleansing fountain are free as the air and are pure as heaven. They are offered without money and without price. Blessed is that word, "whosoever," standing in relation to the water of life as offered by Christ himself. Tens of thousands have experienced the cleansing power of this fountain, and yet it flows on in glorious fulness, in cleansing preciousness, and with divine freeness. When millions of other believing souls have been washed whiter than snow it will be still full and free as now.

It is most encouraging to remember that the Bible gives us illustrations of the conversion of men and women of almost every class and condition. Among those whose penitence and forgiveness are recorded, either in the Old Testament or in the New, are men and women of high and low degree; men and women whose souls were deeply dyed in sin, and other men and women belonging to the more respectable classes of sinners of many ranks. In this number were kings and soldiers, the cultured and the ignorant, politicians and peasants, and even men and women who were the outcasts from society. There is hope for the devil's castaways. The proud Pharisees could see in the woman only the sinner, but the loving Saviour saw in the sinner also the woman. Christ's love and sympathy went out toward the lost with a tenderness which no words can describe. His salvation a river, whose volume is undiminished, and whose power to cleanse no defilement can resist. The proud and self-righteous might shut themselves out from the salvation which Christ offered, but he himself affirmed that the sinners, both men and women, whom the Pharisees stigmatized with defamatory epithets and treated with sneering scorn, were passing into the kingdom while they themselves remained outside. This salvation cannot be purchased by the greatest millionaire, but it will not be denied to the penitent and trustful soul, even though he be a pauper.

In the last place, this is a wonderful Fountain because of Its Cleansing Power.

The vileness of human sin needed a fountain. Who can count up his sins against the great and holy God? Take God's Word as a lighted candle and search the chambers of the heart to-day. Think of the sins of our childhood, of youth, of maturer years and even of old age. We have no arithmetic which can fairly represent the sum of our sins against God. Nothing human can wipe out the long black catalogue. All human means are themselves infected by sin; our very tears are sinful and need washing; our prayers are sinful and need other prayers. Even the pains and penalties of hell cannot remove the guilt of sin; but, thank God, there is power enough in the precious blood of Christ to wash the vilest clean. In this fountain the thief on the cross found cleansing. In this fountain the sinners who were convicted on the day of Pentecost were washed white; in this fountain Saul of Tarsus found his sins washed away, and his whole nature cleansed. Behold the white-robed throng in glory. "What are these who have arrayed in white robes, and whence came they?" The inspired answer is, "These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Behold the [illegible] ble army of martyrs, as they come up from their baptism of fire in which they were tried, and from the baptism of their own blood shed for truth and for God. In dungeons damp and dark they gave up their lives rather than be unfaithful to Jesus; [illegible] in the mighty throng before the throne of God and the Lamb, there is not one word heard of earthly pain as purchasing a palm of gold, a palm of victory, or a crown of life. Their song is, "Worthy is the Lamb" and, "Salvation unto our God." Their robes were made white not in their own merits, but in the blood of the Lamb.

I have read that "the little river Restonica in Corsica has the wonderful property of whitening anything thrown into it. Its waters are clear as crystal, and the small stones which are seen in its bed are as white as chalk. Any kind of metal put particularly iron, when dipped into it, has the appearance of being plated in silver. Its waters are also said to be highly salubrious." This is surely a remarkable stream, but think of that stream that rises as the river of the water of life out of the throne of God and the Lamb. Oh, men and women, let my last word to you be a word of invitation and exhortation. Come to this wonderful fountain; wonderful in its origin; wonderful in its fulness; wonderful in its cleansing power. Be washed whiter than snow, and then at the last may we together stand before the great white throne singing the song of Moses and the Lamb!

A SURPRISED MISSIONARY.

Among the missionaries in Mexico whose acquaintance Messrs. Moody and Sankey made during their recent visit, was one who told them an interesting story of a gift. He needed a plot of land for a mission building in the City of Mexico. The good brother heard that a section in just the right quarter might be bought, but he had no funds. He wanted that land badly, he thought about it by day and dreamed about it by night, and prayed about it continually. At last, he determined to pay a visit there and see if the churches would help him, or they would take up collections in any considerable numbers it might be done. He ascertained that seven thousand dollars cash down, would secure the land. It seemed a large sum to him, but his faith was strong and he made the venture. It was at Cleveland, Ohio, that the effort was made. He obtained permission to preach in the Euclid Avenue Church. It was not an encouraging report that was heard. "All our wealthy men are away just now," said one of the trustees; "you may tell your story and explain your position and what you want to do, but it is no use asking for money." Still he was there, and he could preach, and that was something. He prayed about it and went into the pulpit. He told his story in plain unvarnished words; related what God was doing through him among the Romanists, Catholics and infidels of the City of Mexico; stated what the opportunity was, and how earnestly he longed to avail himself of it. At the close of the services, one and another shook hands with him, hoping he would be successful, encouraged him to trust in God, and were very kind and sympathetic. But there were no contributions. The warning that it was of no use to ask for money was apparently justified. Only one man remained in the middle of the church, and he was waiting around in an uninterested kind of way. He greeted the missionary when the members of the congregation had departed. He said, "You spoke of some land you could get for a mission, did you not?" The missionary said he had done so. "Do you think you could build your house and preaching hall if you had the land?" was the next question. The missionary felt pretty sure that. "How much money did you say you would need?" Seven thousand dollars was the least that the owner would take." "Well," said the unknown, "I will give you that if you feel sure about building the house." The missionary could scarcely believe his own ears. The whole seven thousand in one sum, and from this quiet, plain-looking stranger! It proved true, however. The missionary found that his benefactor was Mr. Rockefeller, who the trustees thought had gone to New York, but had been detained, and was providentially in the missionary's audience. The mission is now established on its new site, and Messrs. Moody and Sankey were welcomed [illegible]

MISSIONARY PERILS.

IN a recent letter from Mrs. McKenzie, a missionary at Bonginda, Africa, a somewhat startling experience is related which affords a realistic glimpse of the perils mission workers in that part of the world are apt to encounter.

"Opposite to this station is a large island covered with grass and bush. The grass is so tall and coarse that you could not possibly walk through it, and if a man were to try and struggle through it, he would get his face and hands badly cut, and his clothes torn. At one end of the island there is a small portion of ground cleared of bush, and on this are built two shimbaks, or native huts, made of palm leaves, and one large log house. Two native Christians live over there in the huts. In the large house are kept our goats and sheep, and Nsombo, (a native convert), takes on the island to take care of them. One night Nsombo and his wife were alone on the island, when they were awakened out of their sleep by hearing a loud shrieking in the boathouse. Nsombo jumped up, seized a stick, and ran to see what was the matter. Imagine how horrified he was to see a large serpent, ten or eleven feet long, gazing at one of the poor sheep with its cruel, glistening eyes, waiting to devour it! Nsombo had no gun, spear, nor knife, and knew if he touched the terrible creature without killing it, it would be sure to take an end of him instead of the sheep. So he stood quite still until the serpent darted out its forked tongue and stung the sheep, which was too frightened to move. Then the serpent opened its mouth and took in the poor sheep's head and gradually sucked in its whole body. When Nsombo saw that it had allowed the sheep, he knew he could not drag itself along quickly because of the heavy sheep being inside, so he ran to the beach and called to us for help. No one on the station heard him shouting, but one of our boys in the town, Eliya, heard the noise, and, taking an iron-pointed stick in his hand, paddled himself over to the island in a small canoe. Then the two crept up softly to the serpent and struck its head with the iron-pointed stick. They had to keep out of the way of its dangerous tongue, and at last severed the head from the body.

"Early next morning I was awakened by a great chattering outside my window, and going out, saw the serpent lying outside the door. Afterwards we cut it open, and took the sheep out quite whole. Then we dried the skin of the serpent's skin, which is very beautiful. When dried it was so tough and strong that we put a little boy in it and carried him as you might be carried in a hammock. Only a year ago Nsombo was a miserable, hunted, runaway slave, who came to us for protection. But now the Lord Jesus has saved him, and he is quite a different man. 'God gave me strength to kill the serpent,' said he, when telling us his story, and again, when the people praised him, he told them the same thing."

THE BONES OF BUDDHA.

An interesting paper was read by Mr. R. ... well before the Asiatic Society of London ...tely, describing some relics of Gautama, Buddha, that are now in the Central ...useum at Madras. They consist of three ...eces of bone taken from his corpse after ...emation, and inclosed in a little casket ...ade of a single beryl. The beryl was in...sed in other caskets of stone, and was ...ried apparently by some one named Ku... in a carefully-built monument at Bhatti...olu, on the bank of the Kistna. Mr. Sewell read the history of the finding of the relics by Mr. Rea, and detailed evidence which conclusively proved that the relics were buried in about 200 B. C., and had not been disturbed since. He thought the evidence quite as good as the evidence of any relic of Charles I., and had indeed no doubt that the bones were taken from Buddha's funeral pile. The beryl being indestructible by time, there is little reason for doubting the authenticity of the relics.

A RICH MAN'S LESSON.

During a recent address, Rev. S. A. Mutchmore related the following instructive anecdote: A prosperous church member was often besought by his pastor to give to the work of evangelizing the city poor, but would always reply: "No, I need it myself." One night he dreamed that he was at the gate of heaven, which was only a few inches ajar. He tried to get in, but could not, and was in agony at his poor prospect.

Then the face of his minister appeared, who said: "Why do you stand there; why don't you go in?" "I can't; I am too large, my pocket-book sticks out whichever way I turn." "Ah," rejoined the pastor, "think how mean you have been to the Lord's poor and you will be small enough to go through the eye of a needle." He awoke, and began to reduce both his pocket-book and his carnality by giving to Christ's cause. Needless to say he never regretted the lesson he had learned although it was but a dream.

PROPHECY AS A GUIDE.

An Important part of the Bible given for the Definite Purpose of Warning.

BY REV. RICHARD CHESTER.

IT is a mistake to regard prophecy as an insoluble puzzle. In the book which contains it we have the key to its solution. There we read prophecies which have become history and we can see for ourselves how they are fulfilled. As we read prophecy we must remember that the boundary line between fulfilled and unfulfilled prophecy is a moving one—that prophecies which to-day are unfulfilled, and belong altogether to prophecy properly so-called, may to-morrow be fulfilled and belong to history.

Now, if we take the key thus supplied by the Word of God itself as furnishing us with our mode of interpretation, what is the result? We find that all the prophecies concerning the people of Israel which have been admittedly fulfilled in the judgments inflicted upon them in the past, and in their present dispersion amongst the nations; and that all the prophecies, moreover, which have been unquestionably fulfilled in the First Advent of our blessed Lord, in his birth, his life, his suffering, his death, his resurrection and ascension, have every one of them been fulfilled with the closest, most minute literality. Are we not, therefore, in a position from which to ask, by what right or authority can any person take upon him to affirm, that the yet unfulfilled prophecies concerning the Second Advent of our blessed Lord—the coming again in "like manner" of "this same Jesus who went up into heaven"—are to be, as they call it, spiritually fulfilled? Many are the theories advanced; some affirm that they were fulfilled long since at the destruction of Jerusalem,—others that they are being continuously fulfilled to each believer at his own death—such being virtually to each believer the Second Coming of the Lord. Others, again, maintain that the Second Advent, while they admit it to be yet future, will be a spiritual—not a personal visible Advent,—the kingdom, a spiritual, not a visible Kingdom—a spiritual, not a personal reign.

But it may be asked how, according to the mode of interpretation which you are thus laying down, will you deal with the Book of Revelation? Are there not figures and symbols to be met with in abundance there? Undoubtedly the book is full of figures and symbols seen in vision by the apostle, they are the figures and symbols, not of things to be hidden, but of things to be revealed. They are, several of them, explained, in the very context of the passages where they occur—those not so explained will for the most part be found used in other portions of the Scriptures from which their signification can easily be determined. To it, not one whit less than to any other portion of the prophetic Word, I firmly believe we should practically apply the wise canon of "the judicious Hooker," that where a literal interpretation is admissible the furthest from the literal is usually the worst.

A further canon to be carefully applied to all prophecy which refers to the Second Advent of our blessed Lord, I would venture very humbly to suggest—namely, that an interpretation of any prophecy such as would necessarily put his long promised coming to "receive his people to himself" to a distance from us that precludes the possibility of its actual occurrence during his own life-time, ought by us to be at once rejected as unsound, for this simple, but sufficient reason, that it is at palpable variance with the manifold signs of the times, and our Lord's own most explicit teaching.

THE PROOF OF ALLEGIANCE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing June 16. 1. John 4: 1-21.

NO surer test has ever been found of the genuineness of conversion than the test of love. The man who has passed through that mysterious change is certain to feel a strong love for his fellow-beings. There will be a special love for his fellow-Christians and a universal love for everyone. This disposition marks the change from the natural to the spiritual life. The Apostle defines it in the passage selected for the Topic and insists upon it as the indispensable proof of the new birth. "He that loveth not," he says, "knoweth not God: for God is love." And as the test for self-examination he gives the same rule: "Hereby know we that we dwell in him and he in us, because he hath given us of his spirit." The effect of that spirit he had previously described, as well as what that spirit was, as it was manifested in self-sacrifice for the race. What then would be the character and conduct of a man with Christ's spirit in him? That is the true test of allegiance. This not a question of orthodoxy, of doctrine or of intellectual belief. The spirit of the man is the man himself and it is that by which he is to be judged. It is not a question of measurement or of capacity but of quality. The candle may give a feeble light, but its light is of the same nature as the sun and it illumines to the extent of its power as the sun does. But the candle must be lighted before it can serve its purpose; and the true Christian must be quickened by divine power before he can become a Christian force in the world. What happens at conversion, is equivalent to what happens to the candle when it is lighted. The natural man becomes a spiritual man, giving light, and fulfilling his destiny as a manifestation of God. The world should be able to see what Christ was and what he still is, by the character and conduct of his individual follower. Perhaps no word covers the characteristics so completely as the word "love." It includes the prominent characteristics of Christ's life. It comprises gentleness, patience, forbearance, unselfishness, self-sacrifice, humility, generosity, compassion and benevolence. Everyone can test this for himself. How does he behave to his child, his wife, or his mother, if he really loves them? His conduct tells him what love is and it is that spirit that is to be the pervading influence of his life if he is to exhibit the spirit of Christ. How such a spirit excludes all that curses the world! The selfishness which would grasp and monopolize the good things of life to the detriment of others; the spirit of competition which we admire and cultivate in our day and which Christ condemned when he detected it in his Apostles; the intolerance which excludes from fellowship the brother who differs from us in his opinion on some abstruse theological doctrine—all these are foreign to the spirit of love which is the spirit of Christ. Whatever tests we set up in our churches we may be sure that in the final judgment the one test applied will be, whether we have manifested in our lives the spirit of Christ.

A FLOURISHING R. R. ASSOCIATION.

A novelty in Association buildings is that occupied by the Railroad Young Men's Christian Association of Clifton Forge, Va. At this place the town and railroad work is combined, and the building, which cost thirteen thousand dollars, is adapted for both. The Association has a membership of 374, and there is an average daily attendance of 154. The attendance at the religious meetings of all kinds is also exceptionally large, which shows that the primary object of the Association has not been overlooked in the athletic and secular tendencies of the day. The general railroad work of the Young Men's Christian Association is developing with most encouraging rapidity. No less than twenty-three of these departments have their own buildings, which in the aggregate are worth $242,300. Eleven others are preparing to erect their own homes, and have already begun the organization of building funds. There are in all over a hundred Railroad Associations and branches, with an aggregate membership of 28,821.

SCOTCH NATIONAL C. E. CONVENTION.

It is gratifying to learn that the Young People's movement has attained such proportions in Scotland that a national convention was in order. It was held recently in Glasgow and the Rev. J. R. Fleming, President of the National Union has sent an enthusiastic report of the sessions to the "Golden Rule." The following extracts will show how cordially the Scotch churches have welcomed the American idea:

There are now two hundred societies in Scotland, and when it is borne in mind that only three were reported at the New York Convention in 1892, it will be seen that the progress of the last three years has been very gratifying. This last year has seen most progress of all, and the holding of the convention is sure to be the occasion of still more rapid advance. The convention committee showed their faith by arranging for the meetings on a large scale. They engaged the biggest hall in Glasgow, sent invitations to all the Scottish societies and to representatives of England and Ireland, offered hospitality to all Endeavorers who were able to come, and provided a guarantee fund against possible loss. Their faith was amply justified. The great St. Andrew's Hall, with a seating capacity of forty-five hundred, was crowded to overflowing, and the lesser conference hall was filled at all the meetings.

The business meetings of the Convention were models of order, and were marked by real enthusiasm. The concluding public meeting, however, was the great meeting of the Convention. The interior of the hall presented an imposing appearance. The motto, "Scotland for Christ," was inscribed in letters of gold above the key-board of the great organ, and across the back gallery ran the device, in similar characters, "For Christ and the Church." Before the platform the C. E. monogram, blended with the Scottish lion rampant, attracted attention, while all around the hall were watchwords illustrating the main principles of the movement. A large choir filled the orchestra, and a great army of ministers and others crowded the platform.

Lord Overtoun presided, and in a very sympathetic speech stirred up the audience to redoubled zeal for Christian Endeavor. The other speakers were Rev. D. F. Mackenzie, Glasgow, who has had wonderful success in his congregation through the working of the Christian Endeavor movement, which, in his case, was the result of a revival.

A thrilling effect was produced by the singing of the Rev. John Pollock's convention song, "Scotland for Christ," which roused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. The final consecration service was very impressively led by the Rev. Evelyn R. Hasse, of Bedford. Responses were given by forty towns. Ministers, Sabbath School teachers, and members of the various committees were called to acts of special consecration, and prayers were offered for absent members and for associates, that they might be led to Christ.

Perhaps the most solemn moment of the convention was when almost the entire body of Endeavorers arose and with uplifted hands promised to do what they could to bring at least one soul to Christ during the ensuing year. Then after the singing of "God be with you," and the joining of hands and hearts in the Mizpah benediction, this memorable gathering came to a close.

Mr. Fleming says that the Convention proves that in Scotland "Christian Endeavor has come to stay and go."

THE TENEMENT HOUSE CHAPTER.

Among the tenements in which the Tenement House Chapter of the King's Daughters works, there are cases of suffering which seem to be almost beyond belief. In a communication to the "Evangelist" a member of the Chapter gives the following description of the troubles that have fallen on one family:

It would be hard to imagine a case more complicated. The father has consumption, the mother has it, too, but more advanced, and with the addition of a tumor! They have four children, the eldest only nine years old. This one, a boy, has hip disease, and had been operated on at St. Mary's Hospital and discharged "cured." But being thrown down on the street about three weeks ago, inflammation has again set in the hip. We found that the doctors would not take the case, as they thought he needed careful and serious attention; they advised sending him at once to a hospital. As the boy had just developed whooping-cough he was debarred from entering the children's wards of all hospitals, except that on "the Island," which all these poor mothers dread for their little ones.

In despair the Nurse went to "St. Mary's" but could get no satisfactory advice. While talking about it, however, two ladies came in, and hearing of the circumstances, became so interested that one of them promised to send her own doctor, who has since visited him three times, our Nurse going daily.

Two of the other children are to be sent to an institute, not having the cough as y and it is a sad necessity to separate family at once. As soon as the boy's cou is better he will be admitted to St. Mar Hospital. We have provided him with wheeled chair, books, and pictures, w which he is quite contented, and he i dear little fellow. And so our relief w goes on from week to week. "I was h gry and ye gave me meat, sick and visited me."

The Homes of Carmel.

T re are Fewer Now Than in Former ars—The Mountain Famous in Bible istory—"The Cave of Elijah."

IN passing across the plain of Esdraelon, there is no more imposing sight that greets the traveler's eye than the noble promontory of Carmel. Our illustration shows the historic mountain at its highest point, whence it overlooks the plain below and the blue Mediteranean beyond. Gdually retiring from the coast, Carmel st ches southeast for a distance of eighte or twenty miles, to a point where it alost meets the green hills of Sa aria. Along its entire course the Carmel range is ull of scenes th are rich in natral beauty. Inncient times, th sides of the ra e, as well as the valleys below were extr nely fertile; ined, the very n me of the mntain signifie "vineyard of e Lord." But the gardens and vinards have lor been neglected and there are at resent compa ively few pls where the art of the husba man is evident. The soil is orn bare in ma y places on the eastern face of e range, and s nly relieved fr the aspect of rrenness by the hick patches of vergreens an clumps of oa and myrtle.

MOUNT CARMEL, AS VIEWED FROM THE PLAIN OF ESDRAELON.
(From a photograph secured in the Holy Land for "The Christian Herald.")

ce dotted with hamlets, Carmel has no very few homes on its rocky sides, whe vineyards and gardens formerly supported a considerable population. When the ar-like Druses from Lebanon and the mntains about Damascus overran Carme the quiet shepherds and vine-dressers we driven out, and their little villages so fell into decay. In recent years an attet was made to establish American colons in Carmel, but it was unsuccessful. St later, a number of German Protestants su eded in establishing a colony on the ra e. There are, besides, several native vilges, all at a considerable altitude. The vilge of Esfieh is estimated to be 1728 feet abe sea level, and its neighborhood is one of e most attractive on the range. There the oil is rich and hyacinths, jonquils, anemes and other flowers grow wild in ab dance.

the summit of Carmel is an old monas y, which was founded in 1156, by Be old, Count of Limoges, but whose mks claim that their Order originated wi Elijah himself. Not far distant from the convent, is a tract of mountain-side cal Monks' Cavern, where hundreds of sm l caves have been hewn out of the limtone rocks, all adjacent to each other an each with a narrow outlet for air and lig. Tradition says that it was to such gr oes that the prophets of old resorted wh sorely pressed by enemies and wishin o hide themselves. Near this nest of caves and a little farther down the hillside is a somewhat larger opening in the rock, called "the Cave of Elijah." Even at the present day monks and hermits make their homes in some of these recesses.

Carmel occupies a prominent place in sacred history, and is frequently referred to as the scene of important events. An altar to Jehovah is believed to have existed there long before Baal-worship had spread in the land. It was the chosen place of assembling of the Hebrew people, and there Elijah brought back recreant Israel to the true God and slew the prophets of Baal. A rough structure of hewn stones at a point called "El Muhrakah," is still shown as the site of the prophet's altar and among the Druses of the neighboring villages along the mountain and at its base, there is a well-preserved tradition which indicates a mound further down the mountain, near the brook, Kishon, and now known as "Tel-el-Kusis" ("the Hill of the Priests") as the scene of the execution that followed the vivid demonstration of the Almighty power.

A Betrothal in India.

Miss Lucy I. Tonge, a missionary worker writes from India, giving this interesting account of a Persian lady's betrothal there:

When we passed to the zenana the sight there was splendid, for on the divan were over one hundred ladies. I could not describe the blaze of jewels, the silks, satins, flowers and paint. They were weighed down with jewels, even wearing anklets over their silk stockings, which were very gay and worked in silk, with flowers and birds. In one part of the room were musicians who sang while a woman who was dressed in striped yellow and black, pink and green trousers, played a tom-tom (drum). Another woman kept up a monotonous dance. The girl-bride was sitting in state at the farther end of the room, and when she was led forth there was a barbarous yelling, intended to frighten away evil spirits. The bride was well hidden that hot afternoon by a large cashmere shawl, The bridegroom was not present, but sent the usual presents, a pair of shoes and a looking-glass. When the bride was seated, a copy of the Koran was given her, and she muttered over the open book quite unconcerned at what was going on. Pointed red shoes given by the bridegroom were put on her. Two bridesmaids performed a very curious act during the ceremony, by grinding two sugar loaves over the bride's head. A Mohammedan priest hidden behind a crimson curtain, read for ten minutes from the Koran and then asked: "Will you have this man for your husband?" The question was repeated again and again, and when at last the answer came, the screaming and howling began, and showers of sweets were thrown over the bride. The bride was again covered with shawls. We saw her later, her beautiful face fully in view, as she had fainted with heat and excitement.

A Great Scholar's Home-Life.

Home-loving, and kindly, in the highest sense, was the late Professor Blackie, the distinguished Scottish scholar, who recently passed away. His domestic tastes were very simple. He rose at 7.30, and for two hours at least was in the open air daily. Two rules governed his whole life: "Speak the truth in love (Eph. 4 : 15), and "all noble things are difficult to do." Next to the blessed Gospel he loved the patriotic songs of his native land. His library contained 7000 volumes, but music or conversation held greater charms for him than reading. He was fond of talking over charitable schemes and plans with his wife, indeed, all his life was marked by acts of helpfulness toward others. This gentle trait of his true Christian character received strong exemplification at the close, for the last coherent syllables that fell from his dying lips upon his wife's ears were whispered words of charity and love.

Spoiled Children.

One of the hardest yet one of the most important things in the training of a loved child is to deny him that which he longs for, and which we could give to him, but which he would better not have. It is very pleasant to gratify a child. But wise withholding is quite as important as generous giving in the proper care of a child. A child ought to be denied, by his parents, many things which in themselves are harmless. That child who has never a legitimate desire ungratified is poorly fitted for the duties and the trials of every-day life in the world. It is because of the evil results of not wisely denying the little ones, that an only child is in so many instances spoken of as a spoiled child. There is but one to give to in that household and that one is a petty tyrant.

TO THE THRONE.

FATHER, I have wandered far,
Oh, be now my guiding star!
Draw my footsteps back to thee,
Set my struggling spirit free.
Save me from the doubts that roll
O'er the chaos of my soul—
Let one ray of truth illume
And dispel the thick'ning gloom!
God of truth and peace and love,
Hear my prayer!
Draw my restless thoughts above—
Keep them there!

Father, save me at this hour
From the tempter's fearful power—
Purify the hidden springs
Of my wild imaginings.
I have thought till thought is pain,
Searched for peace till search is vain.
Out of thee I cannot find
Rest for the immortal mind,
Now I come to thee for aid—
Peace restore!
Let my soul on thee be stayed
For evermore!

MUSIC IN THE HOME.

IN view of the fact that many thousands of our readers find enjoyment in singing and playing over at home the selections furnished every week in our "Service of Song" it may not be uninteresting to them to know what an excellent authority, Miss H. E. Starrett, has to say concerning home music. "We have no more family singing in these latter days of Paris-educated vocal teachers. Nobody can sing now unless he or she has had special voice culture, and the special voice culture of to-day has as yet succeeded in producing, in a majority of pupils, only a self-conscious, affected, unnatural style of singing that is as far removed from true music as the ridiculous lines of the modern songs are removed from true poetry. Oh, to hear in the family some of the old-fashioned, simple, natural, artless singing of songs that were songs; songs of which the words and melody were both beautiful. The young girl who in these days will respond to a request to 'play something,' although it is well-known that she has long taken lessons of an expensive, and perhaps celebrated, music teacher, is such a 'rara avis' that she causes a sensation of surprise when met with. The reply we have all learned to expect from the modern music pupil is: 'Oh, I never play for company,' or, 'Oh, I don't know anything worth playing,' or 'Oh, I am all out of practice.' It is often pitiable to witness the perplexity and disappointment of parents who have, at a great cost of self-sacrifice, purchased a piano, and paid for two or three years of music lessons, when these seemingly trivial excuses are made.

"What is the cause of the disappearance of simple, natural, artless music from the home? Why the infinitesimally small return for the money expended for music lessons? The causes are several. In the first place, the music teacher is often at fault in setting a standard that the ordinary pupil cannot attain to; in belittling simple music and discouraging the pupil from playing it, and entirely ignoring the fact that what parents and friends want in return for the outlay of music lessons is music, even though it be only simple and easy of performance. We do not want, except for occasion, the great work of the masters, the difficult harmonies and complexities of the great composers of oratorio and concerto; we want the simpler works of the musician whose genius appeals to the home and the heart."

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Mary Street Prayer Meeting.

THE next afternoon Mrs. Mapleton asked Alice if Mary-street prayer meeting was not held on Friday night; when answered in the affirmative, she said, "Well, I am going with you, this evening."

"But, mamma, I fear you are not strong enough to go out at night," said Alice.

"I feel, said her mother, that I am a new woman, and have renewed my strength both of body and mind; and I want to go forward and not look back, until I get into the right path, where my footing shall be sure, and I shall feel that I am indeed a new creature."

Although Alice and her mother went early that evening, the people were already singing when they arrived; they never lost time at Mary street prayer meeting; as soon as a sufficient number had gathered to start a hymn, they began, and every minute was occupied, by prayer, song, or speech, until the benediction was pronounced.

There wes no cold formality, no empty space between the minister and congregation, everyone pressed forward until the church was crowded to the door; every person seemed to be in earnest, every one happy, and all acted and spoke as if they felt perfectly at home, and well acquainted one with the other. All distinction seemed to be lost when they entered Mary street prayer meeting; there they became members of one family, children of one Father, at whose house they had gathered to receive his blessing.

Of course such a meeting was a revelation to Mrs. Mapleton; she had never attended anything like it. It was like coming from a dark room into the bright sunlight, and the light was too strong at first to be enjoyed, or like stepping from a cold cellar into a warm room. The change was pleasant, but too sudden to be comfortable. She was weak and nervous and the music and singing were too boisterous, and irritated her finely educated ear. Yet she felt as if her heart swelled within her, and that she must sing herself or suffocate.

The part that most astonished Mrs. Mapleton, however, was the testimony. On the invitation of Mr. Joy, one and another rose to tell what Jesus had done for their souls. At first it struck her as being boastful and indelicate to speak of the most sacred and private matters before so many people; but as she listened, her opinion changed. These people did not boast. They rather depreciated themselves. All their praise was for Christ who had changed heart and life. They took no credit to themselves. Their object was good, too. They wanted to encourage people similarly afflicted to do as they had done. They told their story as patients of some great physician might do, so that people who despaired of recovering their moral health might take heart and go where they could be cured. One testimony impressed the listener very much. It was that of a physician who told how, through the love of drink, he had lost practice, home and friends, and become a tramp. He had strayed into the mission in a hopeless, miserable condition, dirty, ragged, penniless. The kind women there had spoken tenderly to him, had given him new hope, prayed with him, and finally led him to Christ. He was now fully restored to his position in society, and was respected and happy. He made it a point to come to the Mary Street Prayer-meeting very regularly that he might tell his story, in the [illegible] as he had been, to trust in Christ. His recovery, he said, was due entirely to Christ and to these Christian people who had led him to the One able to save. At the close of his story Mrs. Mapleton bowed her head and wept. Then she arose to her feet, and spoke in a low, yet distinct and penetrating tone of voice, and with a tremor that showed intense feeling. The house was hushed into silence, and every word could be distinctly heard. She said, "Dear friends, I feel that I am a poor, selfish, ungrateful and lost sinner."

"Thank the Lord!" shouted Mr. Joy, "that you have found it out."

"I feel," continued Mrs. Mapleton, "that I am unworthy of his love; he gave me every blessing and I was not thankful, but selfish, and thought only of myself and mine. Then he took from me what I was not worthy to keep, and I was helpless and in despair, yet thought only of my own suffering and loss, and not of others. My heart was hard and in rebellion, but my eyes have been opened, and and I now see how selfish, weak, and wrong I have been, so I ask your prayers and help, that I may yet show my love and gratitude to him who has borne with me so long, and find work in his vineyard, however humble the position may be."

She sat down, and someone started the hymn, "Jesus, lover of my soul," in which the whole house joinod.

Poor Alice sat with bowed head, the tears rolling down her cheeks and her heart was full. She had never loved her mother as she did at that moment—never felt so proud of her before. She caught her hand and held it in both of hers, and whispered as they sat together, "Oh, Mamma, I am so happy, this more than pays me for all I have gone through."

CHAPTER XXIV.

Fred's Return.

The formal part of the meeting was over, when a commotion was noticed at the door: some one had entered, and there was shaking of hands and welcoming voices heard, as a tall, manly figure in a traveling cloak forced his way through the crowd.

"Bless my heart! if here isn't our dear young friend Morgan come back to us," said Mr. Joy, stretching out both hands to the new-comer.

At the mention of that name, Alice buried her face in her hand, resting her head on the back of the seat in front of her.

"Yes, Mr. Joy," said Morgan, as he caught the pastor's hands in both of his, "thank the dear Lord, I am home again. I arrived by steamer this afternoon, and have been driving furiously about the city, trying to find some very dear but lost friends; I was disappointed in my efforts; then I thought of Mary street prayer-meeting, and luckily have caught some of you, owing to your bad practice of keeping late hours."

The sound of Fred's voice had a strange effect on Alice; she seemed as if paralyzed. She shook from head to feet, but had no power to move or speak.

"Well," said Mr. Joy, "let me introduce you to one of our new members, and one we are very proud of; Miss—" then he stopped with a puzzled look on his face, for Alice still sat with her head bowed and seemed to be weeping.

"Fred! O, Fred!" came in a muffled, plaintive voice, and in a moment Fred had lifted the young lady to her feet, removed her hands from her face, and she immediately threw her arms around his neck, as he stooped and kissed her lips; then realizing what she had done, and where she was, her face became crimson, and hiding her face, she sobbed, as he held her tightly to his breast.

The few ladies and gentlemen who had returned to the front of the church to welcome the traveler home, stood motionless in their astonishment, and Mr. Joy stood with mouth and eyes wide open, and with a look on his face as one of the young ladies said afterwards—"too comical for anything."

"Found at last, thank the Lord, found at last," said Fred.

"[illegible]," said Mr. Joy.

Then Fred, for the first time, noticing the wondering look on the faces around him, burst out laughing and said, "it's all right, dear friends; this is my lost lamb;" then turning to Alice, he said, "do not tremble so, dear Alice; these are my dearest friends, and I will explain it to them."

"Never mind," said Mr. Joy; "as neither of you seem to be exactly in your right mind just now, we will retire," and smiling, he with the others retreated down the aisle.

"Oh! Alice, how I have tried to find you, and then to think that I should come here, to one of the last places in this great city that I should ever expect to find you; the Lord must have led me here in answer to my prayers."

"I believe he did," said Alice. "Oh, how good he has been to me. How glad mamma will be when she knows you are here."

"Do you think so?" asked Fred in a doubtful tone.

"Oh, yes, indeed; she has felt very sorry and sad, and was so afraid that she would never see you again to ask your forgiveness. And you must forgive her, Fred; she has suffered so much."

"Well, I guess so," said Fred. "I would forgive every enemy I ever had to-night, and especially one who perhaps did just the right thing, after all, and who, at any rate, is the mother of the dearest girl in the whole world. I have heard of some of your trouble, the death of your father, and the loss of your property."

"And poor, dear Will!" said Alice. "Oh, it is not right for me to be so happy, now he is dead."

"Oh, here comes mother," cried Alice. "I forgot to tell you that she was here."

"What! Mrs. Mapleton here!" was all that Fred could say in his surprise at meeting the proud lady in such a place.

"Mamma, do you know who this is?" asked Alice, as she led Fred into the aisle to meet her mother.

Mrs. Mapleton gave him one look, in which doubt, surprise, joy seemed to take each other's places with lightning rapidity; then as she put out her hand cordially, her eyes filled with tears.

Fred clasped her hand respectfully and said, "My dear Mrs. Mapleton, I am delighted to meet you once more, but why are you said?"

"Oh, Fred, I have been so cruel and unjust to you, and to my own, that now when my eyes have been opened, and I see how kindly I have been treated—not only by the dear Lord, but also by those whom I have wronged—I feel so humble that I want to get down on my knees and ask forgiveness. I know that the Lord has forgiven me, so I hope that you also will forgive me."

She offered Fred her hand as she spoke and Fred took it in his broad palm and raised it to his lips and kissed it. "My best answer," he said, is to ask you to let me be a son to you."

"Let us go home," said Alice, "where we can talk."

"Yes," said Fred' "I have a carriage at the door."

"I hope you have been repaid for coming here, to-night, said Mr. Joy, as he handed Mrs. Mapleton into the carriage.

"Far more than I deserve," said Mrs. Mapleton. "this has been one of the happiest evenings of my life. Oh, how much happiness and peace I have missed in not looking for it, where it was to be found, or through ignorance in refusing to accept it when offered."

"Yes, how blind we are," said the minister. "Good night, and God bless you—and you, too, my boy," he said, taking Fred by the hand, "I am very glad to have you back with us again, safe and sound. And Miss Alice, to you I will confess that I have often wondered if some sorrow was not in your heart, and I have been on the eve of seeking your confidence many times; but I see the sun has scattered the cloud, and your happy look makes me feel so very, very happy, that I feel like going back into the empty church and singing with all my might."

"Dont," said Fred, as he stepped into the carriage. "I doubt if the walls would stand that."

The carriage rolled away, and left Mr. Joy, shaking with laughter on the pavement. "Fred," said Alice, "I never thought until I was giving directions to the driver, how astonished you will be when you see the home we are taking you to."

"The home that has sheltered you," he said, taking her hand, "will be the most delightful spot on earth to me to-night; no matter how poor."

Yet, he was very much astonished [illegible] shocked—although he managed to hid[illegible] —when the carriage stopped in front of [illegible] tenement house, and he saw the dil[illegible] dated appearance of the neighborhood; e[illegible] the driver pocketed his fee and drove ra[illegible] ly away, with an injured look on his [illegible] as if he and his carrige had been impt[illegible] upon and his dignity injured by b[illegible] brought into such a neighborhood, and [illegible] quicker he got out of it the better it w[illegible] be for his reputation as a genteel coachm[illegible].

Both the outside appearance, and the [illegible]side world were forgotten, when the [illegible] was lighted and the three gathered arc[illegible] the bright fire in Mrs. Mapleton's cosy [illegible] parlor, while Alice was relating the sto[illegible] their lives, or rather of the last three y[illegible].

It was not a pleasant story, as our r[illegible] ers know. According to the old prov[illegible] "All is well that ends well," but experi[illegible] does not confirm it. Fred could not re[illegible] as "well" the suffering Alice had end[illegible] through the persecution of Mr. Jack[illegible] and although she softened the recital [illegible] kept back some of the worst features [illegible] story, Fred was stirred to indignatio[illegible] what he heard. Time passed quickly [illegible] it was late before Fred was in possess[illegible] all the facts.

"Now," said Alice, tell us about y[illegible]self. We want to know where you [illegible] been and what you have done."

Fred looked at his watch. "It is too [illegible] a story for to-night," he said. "Mrs [illegible]pleton looks very tired. I will come i[illegible] morning and tell you all."

"Poor mamma," said Alice, "it i[illegible] bad to have kept you up like this. [illegible] no idea it was so late. Why did yo[illegible] remind me that your usual hour of re[illegible] was so long past? You look worn ou[illegible].

"No, dear, I am quite well, and i[illegible] been such a pleasure to have a visitor [illegible] such a visitor. But I confess to feel [illegible] little tired. So, if Mr. Morgan will e[illegible] me, I will say good-night now."

Left alone with Fred, Alice began a [illegible] fire of questions, asking especially wh[illegible] had discovered about Will. Fred ans[illegible] cautiously, and evidently with const[illegible] and in an under tone, lest his words s[illegible] reach Mrs. Mapleton's ears.

They were startled by a knock o[illegible] door, followed by the entrance of Mrs [illegible]laghan with a card in her hand whic[illegible] gave to Alice. The card bore the na[illegible] James Graham.

"Come in, Mrs. Callaghan," said [illegible] "this is Mr. Morgan, of whom you [illegible] heard; and Mr. Morgan, this is my [illegible] friend, Mrs. Callaghan, of whom I [illegible] told you."

"I am very glad to meet you, Mrs [illegible]laghan," said Fred, as he took her [illegible] "and to thank you with all my hea[illegible] your many kind acts to this young [illegible] and her mother."

"And I am as glad to see you, sur[illegible] my own brother—who is in the army [illegible] come home to tell me he had been n[illegible] sergeant. But don't mention anyt[illegible] have done for her; shure, sur, it [illegible] blessed day for me and mine, inda[illegible] the whole neighborhood, when she [illegible] and it will be a sorry day for us wh[illegible] she leaves, as I know she must, for this [illegible] is no place for the loikes of her and h[illegible] mother."

"Are you alone, Mrs. Callaghan? [illegible] are the children in bed?" asked Al[illegible].

"Shure, Miss, they are all fast [illegible] and have been for hours; and my [illegible] won't be home till near morning, as [illegible] to work all night."

"Then we want to use your little p[illegible]," said Alice, "as Mr. Morgan has son[illegible] to tell me, and we do not want to [illegible] mother."

"Shure, you are welcome to it as [illegible] you need it, and I am very sorry I [illegible] a better one to offer you," said Mr [illegible]laghan, as she led the way across t[illegible].

"I'm sure it is very comfortable [illegible] Alice as they entered.

"Do not leave us," said Fred, a[illegible] Callaghan was going out. "There i[illegible] ing in what I am about to say b[illegible] you may hear; indeed, I think you [illegible] much interested, and I shall take it [illegible] vor if you will remain with Miss Al[illegible].

"Then it is not what I thought yo[illegible] ed to be after saying," said Mrs. Cal[illegible].

"Oh, no," said Alice with a sm[illegible] said all that years ago."

"Which shows that he has go[illegible] as well as good looks," said Mrs. Cal[illegible].

"Thank you," said Fred, as he [illegible] to the table.

Shortly afterward, the Gold Coast Mission was begun, with Rev. J. Dunwell as teacher. His labors were greatly blessed, but he soon died of fever, the first of a long list of consecrated men who laid down their lives for the work. Missionary circuits were formed at Cape Coast Town, Disc Cove, James Town, Lagos, Badagry, Abeokuta, and other points along the coast and far into the interior. Coomassie, the capital of Ashanti, was, for a time, occupied by the missionaries, and the Gospel was faithfully preached to the King and his people. Several places of worship were established and schools opened. Should the Ashanti people

ELI BROWN.

FREE.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

THE KINGDOM.*

"CHURCH" and "kingdom" are not synonymous words. The church was the ecclesia—was to Christians what the synagogue was to Jews. We do not mean that that was all that it was ever intended to be, but that is all it was at first, and there are no hints in the New Testament of its future development. The kingdom of God is the grand and glorious ideal. It is "the royal rule" of God; it is sometime to fill the earth, to embrace all spheres of life; its characteristics are fatherhood, brotherhood, love, and "the realization of righteousness in the life of humanity." This was the good news which the prophets predicted, the Master proclaimed, and the apostles preached. The church, on the other hand, so far as it may be traced, is an evolution of one phase of the kingdom. The kingdom was preached; the message was accepted; the Christ was obeyed; and those who were of one heart and one mind naturally came together. So far as they had the common life they were one, but it was inevitable that the kingdom should attract some because it pleased their intellects. Many gave to it intellectual adherence who would not yield their wills to its sway. From the first, therefore, there were those in the church who were not in the kingdom—the apostle reproved the Corinthians because of their unseemly conduct at the celebration of the Supper. The church grew faster than the kingdom. From the beginning some were in the kingdom who were not in the church, as there were those in the church who were not in the kingdom. "Kingdom" is the larger word. The church is one of many instruments by which the kingdom is to be advanced. If the inquiry now arises as to whether the church is on a level with other instruments, we reply that the ideal church is the kingdom in the phase of "its corporate self-consciousness;" that it is composed of those, and those only, who are in the kingdom, who are conscious of the fact, and who are seeking to make the kingdom prevail. As Principal Fairbairn has expressed it, "The church is the kingdom seen from below, and the kingdom is the church seen from above." "Polity is not of its essence; saints and souls are."

Only as the church is devoted to the advancement of the kingdom does it fulfil its function; when it seeks anything for itself it is false to the kingdom. It is as true of the church as of individuals that "he that would save his life must lose it." Denominational selfishness is as pernicious as individual selfishness. In so far as liturgies and polities are manifestations of the divine life they are of value, and helps to the kingdom; but in so far as they are simply the expression of esthetic sense, or desire for power, they are worldly and hindrances to the kingdom. The kingdom, which is the divine life in humanity, can never develop into anything which is in antagonism with itself. The visible church is composed of sects. No one sect has any more right than another to calls itself the church. The Roman and the Anglican are as truly sects as the Primitive Methodist and Plymouth Brethren. Historic continuity is not necessarily divine development. It is a serious question how much of the machinery and how many of the forms of worship of our time have any relation to the life of God as it was in Christ Jesus. That life is spirit; it is manifested only by holiness; it cannot be communicated through material channels; it is not dependent on physical touch. Whatever gives that life freer passage is of [illegible]; whatever diverts attention to itself and away from that life is of man.

The organization of the church must change with the expansion of the kingdom. In the nature of things, as time advances and localities are different, the means by which men may be induced to accept the royal sway of God must of themselves be different.

SOJOURNER TRUTH'S ELOQUENCE.†

She made a fine point on the Constitution the year the weevil destroyed so much wheat. Said she: "Chil'ern, I talks to God, an' God talks to me. Dis mornin' I was walkin' out, an' I got ober de fence into de field. I saw de wheat a holdin' up its head lookin' very big. I goes up an' takes holt ob it. You believe it, dare was no wheat dare? I says, 'God,' (speaking the name reverently) 'what is de matter wid dis wheat?' an' he says to me, 'Sojourner, dare is a little weasel in it.' Now I hears talkin' about de Constitution, an' de rights ob man. I comes up an' I takes holt ob dis Constitution. It looks mighty big, an' I feel for my rights, but dar aint any dar. Den I says, 'God, what ails dis Constitution?' He says to me, 'Sojourner, dar is a little weasel in it.'"

Volumes were written about the Negro and the Constitution, but here was a volume in a few sentences.

Harriet Beecher Stowe says of her: "I never knew a person who possessed so much of that subtle, controlling personal power, called presence, as she." Wendell Phillips stated, that he had known a few words from her to electrify an audience. In proof of this he cites the question she asked Frederick Douglass, who was speaking in Faneuil Hall at one of the darkest periods of the abolition struggle. Douglass was sad,—almost ready to despair, when she lifted her long finger and asked, loud enough to be heard by all, "Frederick, is God dead?" That was all she said, but it was enough.

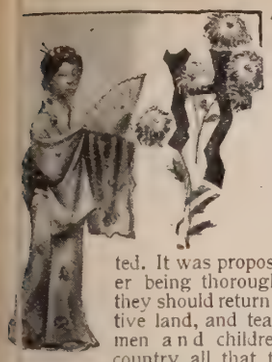
Busy Women should use— WHITMAN'S INSTANTANEOUS CHOCOLATE

What a Japanese Girl Did.



ARDLY fourteen years ago, four little girls were sent to this country by the government of Japan to be educated. It was proposed that after being thoroughly trained they should return to their native land, and teach the women and children of that country all that they themves had learned while here. One of the artette of girls was Stematz Yamakawa. e found a home in the family of Dr. onard W. Bacon, of New Haven, Conn., d soon began to go to Sunday School th his daughter, Alice. The little Japangirl was bright and interesting, and ade many friends. She also showed an elligent mind, and made such progress in r studies that after a few years she went Vassar College, and in due time was aduated from there with high honors. ie Japanese minister came on from Washgton to hear her graduating address. ter graduation, she remained some time New Haven, in order to get some knowlge of medicine and nursing, with the idea training her own countrywomen in these fections. Best of all, she became a true ristian, and united with Dr. Bacon's urch.

Stematz had now become an exceedingly eresting as well as educated young wo-n. But the time had come for her to re-n to Japan, and she went back to her n country followed by the prayers of her ny friends in America. Two year's aft- returning to Japan, Stematz became untess Oyama, and has since been a der among the noble ladies of Japan. unt Oyama, her husband, is one of the emost men in the Japanese Empire. He ame Minister of War in the cabinet of Emperor, and during the late war with ina, he commanded the second division the Japanese army of invasion. The minent position of her husband gives to Countess great influence. Both in pubband in private she has had opportunity make good use of her Christian training eived in America.

LEARNING OF CHRIST.

Saadi, the famous Persian novelist, in e of his writings relates that he once took in his hand a piece of scented clay, and d: "O, clay, whence hast thou thy perne?" And the clay said: 'I was once a ce of common clay; but they laid me for ime in company with a rose, and I drank its fragrance, and have now become nted clay.' So the world will know the npany you keep by the fragrance. If u have lain in beds of spices, you will ell of the myrrh, and the spikenard, and aloes. None will not think you have en with Christ, unless they can first perve that you have learned of Him."

ORIENTAL EXTRAVAGANCE.

The most costly carpet in the world is in e treasure-room of the Maharajah of Bara, India. The carpet is some ten feet by , and woven from strings of pearls with ge central and corner circles of diamonds. required three years to make it, and its st was nearly $1,000,000. It was the ak of an Indian potentate, Khande Rao, d he intended to send it to Mecca as a esent to a Mohammedan lady. This ce of phenomenal extravagance stands a lesson to all of the folly and sinfulness indulging in vanity, and wasting means at might be used to better advantage in e service of humanity.

Shepherds of the City of David and their Flocks — An Ancient Grotto in the Fields—The Legend of "The Well of the Magi."

CURIOUS travelers along the road that winds from Jerusalem to Bethlehem like a ribbon of silver, are attracted by many scenes full of sacred interest, and which invite them to turn a moment from the well-worn highway. Leaving Jerusalem, and passing down the Valley of Hinnom, southward, they soon find themselves in an open upland country, which at this season of the year is abloom with wild flowers. The Greek Convent of Elias, with its enclosed gardens and attractive shade, tempts them to halt, if the day be warm; but at this point a turn of the road reveals Bethlehem in their place, its white walls and limestone roofs gleaming in the sun, and they are irresistibly urged onward. The traditional tomb of Rachel is next passed on the summit of Ramah the latter now a mere ruin.

From this point one can overlook the fair fields and orchards which are just outside of David's City. Here and there a villager may be seen at work in the fields, or it may be some peasant farmer, driving his lazy oxen up and down the furrows. But the land is not now as fertile as it must have been in Bible times, and there are many barren stony places in the fields that were so prolific of wheat and corn that the white village was literally "the house of bread." In one of the fields is a dilapidated well, probably dried up long ago—for wells are now scarce around Bethlehem. It is known as "the Grotto of the Shepherds," and its wide and deep mouth, leading to still darker deeps below, is formed of great limestone boulders, roughly hewn and wedged together with such strength and solidity that only the force of an earthquake could wrench them apart. Here, in this cool and shady recess, sheltered from the fierce glare of the Syrian sun, the shepherds are wont to sit, while their flocks are feeding on the scant herbage, or lying under the shade of some friendly trees or clump of bushes. From such a well as this once was, it may be that the swarthy reapers of Boaz in his ancient fields near by, drew water to refresh themselves at their toil. Here Joseph and Mary and the Divine Child may have rested in their flight. Across these fields young David may have roamed while tending the flocks of Jesse, and at this well Israel's shepherd-king may have drank of the cool, sparkling spring, long since dried up.

There is a very beautiful legend in Bethlehem, which says that the "wise men of the East" who had followed the Star to these quiet plains were greatly dispirited to find that they had lost their celestial guide. They had apparently made certain, in their own minds, that the Jewish Capital was the locality indicated by the Star, and their vigilant watch of the heavens was accordingly relaxed. Presently, to their amazement and consternation, they found that their bright monitor had wholly vanished from the sky, and they then discovered, to their sorrow, that they had been guilty of carelessness in trusting to their own judgment, rather than implicitly accepting its guidance to the end of their journey. So the three travelers paused, and taking counsel together, prayed that the Lord might restore to them their lost guide and that they might be permitted to follow its leadings in humble obedience. They halted while yet some distance from Jerusalem, not daring to proceed farther until they should receive some Divine token of encouragement. During their halt, they rested at a well in the plain, which local tradition indicates as the "Well of the Magi." It was doubtless just such a well as that shown in in the photograph.

THE SHEPHERD'S GROTTO OR LEGENDARY "WELL OF THE MAGI," BETHLEHEM.
(From a Photograph secured in the Holy Land by the Proprietor of "The Christian Herald.")

Looking wistfully into its cool depths, they were overjoyed to find, mirrored on its placid surface, the reflection of the Star, which, though it had become for the time invisible to their eyes, was at that moment shining brightly overhead. They raised their eyes once more heavenward and there it shone more resplendent than ever. Led by its rays, Melchior, Balthasar, and Gaspar continued their journey, until they found the object of their search in the lowly Manger of Bethlehem.

Such is the legend which the Christian mothers of Bethlehem tell to their children, when the stars shine out at eventide across the plains and over the humble city of the Saviour's nativity.

EXPURGATION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., on the Text: "Let God be true but every man a liar." Romans 3: 4.

THE Bible needs reconstruction according to some inside and outside the pulpit. It is no surprise that the world bombards the Scriptures, but it is amazing to find Christian ministers picking at this in the Bible and denying that until many good people are left in the fog about what parts of the Bible they ought to believe, and what parts reject. The heinousness of finding fault with the Bible at this time is most evident. In our day the Bible is assailed by scurrility, by misrepresentation, by infidel scientists, by all the vice of earth and all the venom of perdition, and at this particular time even preachers of the Gospel fall into line of criticism of the Word of God. Why, it makes me think of a ship in a September equinox, the waves dashing to the top of the smoke-stack, and the hatches fastened down, and many prophesying the foundering of the steamer, and at that time some of the crew with axes and saws go down into the hold of the ship, and they try to saw off some of the planks and pry out some of the timbers because the timber did not come from the right forest! It does not seem to me a commendable business for the crew to be helping the winds and storms outside with their axes and saws inside. Now, this old Gospel ship, what with the roaring of earth and hell around the stem and stern, and mutiny on deck, is having a very rough voyage, but I have noticed that not one of the timbers has started, and the Captain says He will see it through. And I have noticed that keelson and counter-timber-knee are built out of Lebanon cedar, and she is going to weather the gale, but no credit to those who make mutiny on deck.

When I see professed Christians in this particular day finding fault with the Scriptures, it makes me think of a fortress terrifically bombarded, and the men on the ramparts, instead of swabbing out and loading the guns, and helping fetch up the ammunition from the magazine, are trying with crowbars to pry out from the wall certain blocks of stone, because they did not come from the right quarry. Oh, men on the ramparts, better fight back, and fight down the common enemy, instead of trying to make breaches in the wall.

While I oppose this expurgation of the Scriptures, I shall give you my reasons for such opposition. "What!" say some of the theological evolutionists, whose brains have been addled by too long brooding over them by Darwin and Spencer, "you don't now really believe all the story of the Garden of Eden, do you?" Yes, as much as I believe there were roses in my garden last summer. "But," say they, "you don't really believe that the sun and moon stood still?" Yes, and if I had strength enough to create a sun and moon I could make them stand still, or cause the refraction of the sun's rays so it would appear to stand still. "But," they say, "you don't really believe that the whale swallowed Jonah?" Yes, and if I were strong enough to make a whale I could have made very easy ingress for the refractory prophet, leaving to Evolution to eject him, if he were an unworthy tenant! "But," say they, "you don't really believe that the water was turned into wine?" Yes, just as easily as water now is often turned into wine with an admixture of strychine and logwood! "But," say they, "you don't really believe that Samson slew a thousand with the jaw-bone of an ass?" Yes, and I think that the man who in this day assaults the Bible is wielding the same weapon!

There is nothing in the Bible that staggers me. There are many things I do not understand, I do not pretend to understand, never shall in this world understand. But that would be a very poor God who could be fully understood by the human. That would be a very small Infinite that can be measured by the finite. You must not expect to weigh the thunderbolts of Omnipotence in an apothecary's balances. Starting with the idea that God can do anything, and that he was present at the beginning, and that he is present now, there is nothing in the Holy Scriptures to arouse scepticism in my heart. Here I stand, a fossil of the ages, dug up from the tertiary formation, fallen off the shelf of an antiquarian, a man in the latter part of the nineteenth century believing in a whole Bible from lid to lid!

I am opposed to the expurgation of the Scriptures in the first place, because the Bible in its present shape has been so miraculously preserved. Fifteen hundred years after Herodotus wrote his history, there was only one manuscript copy of it. Twelve hundred years after Plato wrote his book, there was only one manuscript copy of it. God was so careful to have us have the Bible in just the right shape that we have fifty manuscript copies of the New Testament a thousand years old, and some of them fifteen hundred years old. This Book handed down from the time of Christ, or just after the time of Christ, by the hand of such men as Origen in the second century and Tertullian in the third century, and by men of different ages who died for their principles. The three best copies of the New Testament in manuscript in the possession of the three great churches—the Protestant Church of England, the Greek Church of St. Petersburg, and the Romish Church of Italy.

It is a plain matter of history that Tischendorf went to a convent in the peninsula of Sinai and was by ropes lifted over the wall into the convent, that being the only mode of admission, and that he saw there in the waste basket for kindling for the fires, a manuscript of the Holy Scriptures. That night he copied many of the passages of that Bible, but it was not until fifteen years had passed of earnest entreaty and prayer and coaxing and purchase on his his part that that copy of the Holy Scriptures was put into the hand of the Emperor of Russia—that one copy so marvellously protected.

Do you not know that the catalogue of the books of the Old and New Testaments as we have it, is the same catalogue that has been coming on down through the ages? Thirty-nine books of the Old Testament thousands of years ago. Thirty-nine now. Twenty-seven books of the New Testament sixteen hundred years ago. Twenty-seven books of the New Testament now. Marcion, for wickedness, was turned out of the Church in the second century, and in his assault on the Bible and Christianity, he incidentally gives a catalogue of the books of the Bible—that catalogue corresponding exactly with ours—testimony given by the enemy of the Bible and the enemy of Christianity. The catalogue now just like the catalogue then. Assaulted and spit on and torn to pieces and burned, yet adhering. The book to-day, in three hundred languages, confronting four-fifths of the human race in their own tongue. Four hundred million copies of it in existence. Does not that look as if this Book had been divinely protected, as if God had guarded it all through the centuries?

Is it not an argument plain enough to every honest man and every honest woman, that a book divinely protected and in this shape is in the very shape that God wants it? It pleases God and ought to please us. The epidemics which have swept thousands of other books into the sepulchre of forgetfulness, have only brightened the fame of this. There is not one book out of a thousand that lives five years. Any publisher will tell you that. There will not be more than one book out of twenty thousand that will live a century. Yet, here is a Book, much of it sixteen hundred years old, and much of it four thousand years old, and with more rebound and resilience and strength in it than when the book was first put upon parchment or papyrus. This Book saw the cradle of all other books, and it will see their graves. Would you not think that an old book like this, some of it forty centuries old, would come along hobbling with age and on crutches? Instead of that, more potent than any other book of the time. More copies of it printed in the last ten years than of any other book—Walter Scott's Waverly Novels, Macaulay's "History of England," Disraeli's "Endymion," the works of Tennyson and Longfellow, and all the popular books of our time having no such sale in the last ten years as this old worn-out Book. Do you know what a struggle a book has in order to get through one century or two centuries? Some old books, during a fire in a seraglio of Constantinople, were thrown into the street. A man without any education picked up one of those books, read it, and did not see the value of it. A scholar looked over his shoulder and saw it was the first and second decades of Livy, and he offered the man a large reward if he would bring the books to his study; but in the excitement of the fire, the two parted, and the first and second decades of Livy were forever lost. Pliny wrote twenty books of history; all lost. The most of Menander's writings lost. Of one hundred and thirty comedies of Plautus, all gone but twenty. Euripides wrote a hundred dramas, all gone but nineteen. Æschylus wrote a hundred dramas, all gone but seven. Varro wrote the laborious biographies of seven hundred Romans, not a fragment left. Quintilian wrote his favorite book on the corruption of eloquence, all lost. Thirty books of Tacitus lost. Dion Cassius wrote eighty books, only twenty remain. Berosius's history all lost.

Nearly all the old books are mummified and are lying in the tombs of old libraries, and perhaps once in twenty years some man comes along and picks up one of them and blows the dust off, and opens it and finds it the book he does not want. But this old Book, much of it forty centuries old, stands to-day more discussed than any other book, and it challenges the admiration of all the good and the spite and the venom and the animosity and the hypercriticism of earth and hell. I appeal to your common sense, if a book so divinely guarded and protected in its present shape, must not be in just the way that God wants it to come to us, and if it pleases God, ought it not to please us?

Not only have all the attempts to detract from the Book failed, but all the attem to add to it. Many attempts were made add the apochryphal books to the Old T tament. The Council of Trent, the Sy of Jerusalem, the Bishops of Hippo, all cided that the apochryphal books must added to the Old Testament. "They m stay in," said those learned men; but t stayed out. There is not an intellig Christian man that to-day will put Book of Maccabees or the Book of Ju beside the Book of Isaiah or Romans. T a great many said, "we must have bo added to the New Testament," and t were epistles and gospels and apocalyp written and added to the New Testam but they have all fallen out. You can add anything. You cannot subtract a thing. Divinely protected Book in the p ent shape. Let no man dare to lay hands on it with the intention of detrac from the Book, or casting out any of t holy pages.

Beside that, I am opposed to this ex gation of the Scriptures because if th tempt were successful, it would be the nihilation of the Bible. Infidel geolog would say, "out with the Book of G sis;" infidel astronomers would say, with the Book of Joshua;" people wh not believe in the atoning sacrifice w say, "out with the Book of Levitic people who do not believe in the mir would say, "out with all those wond stories in the Old and New Testamen and some would say, "out with the B of Revelation;" and others would say, with the entire Pentateuch," and the w would go on until there would not be enc of the Bible left to be worth as much as year's almanac. The expurgation of Scriptures means their annihilation.

I am also opposed to this proposed ex gation of the Scriptures for the fact th proportion as people become self-sacrifi and good and holy and consecrated, like the Book as it is. I have yet to fi man or a woman distinguished for self rifice, for consecration to God, for holi of life, who wants the Bible chan Many of us have inherited family Bi Those Bibles were in use twenty, fi fifty, perhaps a hundred years in the erations. To-day take down those fa Bibles, and find out if there are any c ters which have been erased by lead p or pen, and if in any margins you can the words: "this chapter not fit to re There has been plenty of opportunity ing the last half century privately to e gate the Bible. Do you know any ca such expurgation? Did not your gra father give it to your father, and did o your father give it to you?

Beside that, I am opposed to the e gation of the Scriptures, because th called indelicacies and cruelties of the have demonstrated no evil result. A book will produce cruelty—an unclean will produce uncleanness. Fetch me a tim. Out of all Christendom and o all the ages, fetch me a victim whose has been hardened to cruelty, or whos life has been made impure by this Book. S me one. One of the best families I knew of, for thirty or forty years, m ing and evening, had all the members gathered together, and the servants of the hold, and the strangers that happened within the gates—twice a day, wi leaving out a chapter or a verse, they this holy Book, morning by morning, by night. Not only the older childre the little child who could just spell he through the verse while her mother her. The father beginning and readi verse, and then all the members of the ily in turn reading a verse. The maintained his integrity, the mother tained her integrity, the sons grew entered professions and commercia adorning every sphere in the life in they lived, and the daughters went families where Christ was honored, a that was good and pure and rig reigned perpetually. For thirty year family endured the Scriptures. Not them ruined by them.

Now, if you will tell me of a family where t Bible has been read twice a day for rty years, and the children have been ught up in that habit, and the father nt to ruin, and the mother went to ruin, d the sons and daughters were destroyed it—if you will tell me of one such inci- nt, I will throw away my Bible, or I will ubt your veracity. I tell you, if a man is ocked with what he calls the indelica- s of the Word of God, he is prurient in taste and imagination. If a man can- t read Solomon's Song, without impure ggestion, he is either in his heart, or in life, a libertine.

The Old Testament description of wick- ess, uncleanness of all sorts, is pur- sely and righteously a disgusting ac- unt, instead of the Byronic and the Paris- n vernacular which makes sin attrac- e instead of appalling. When those old phets point you to a lazaretto, you un- stand it is a lazaretto When a man ving begun to do right falls back into ckedness and gives up his integrity, the ple does not say he was overcome by the cinations of the festive board, or that he rendered to convivialities, or that he be- ne a little fast in his habits. I will tell u what the Bible says: "The dog is ned to his own vomit again, and the sow at was washed to her wallowing in the re." No gilding of iniquity. No gar- ds on a death's-head. No pounding ay with a silver mallet at iniquity when needs an iron sledge-hammer.

I can easily understand how people, oding over the description of unclean- ss in the Bible, may get morbid in mind til they are as full of it as the wings and e beak and the nostril and the claw of a zzard is full of the odors of a carcass; t what is wanted is not that the Bible be sinfected, but that you, the critic, have ur mind and heart washed with carbolic id!

I tell you at this point in my discourse at a man who does not like this Book, d who is critical as to its contents, and no is shocked and outraged with its de- riptions, has never been soundly convert- . The laying on of the hands of Presby- y, or Episcopacy, does not always change man's heart, and men sometimes get into e pulpit as well as into the pew, never ving been changed radically by the sov- eign grace of God. Get your heart right d the Bible will be right. The trouble is en's natures are not brought into har- ony with the Word of God. Ah! my ends, expurgation of the heart is what anted.

You cannot make me believe that the riptures, which this moment lie on the ble of the purest and best men and wom- of the age, and which were the dying lace of your kindred passed into the skies, ive in them a taint which the strongest icroscope of honest criticism could make sible. If men are uncontrollable in their dignation when the integrity of wife or ild is assailed, and judges and jurors as r as possible excuse violence under such ovocation, what ought to be the over- helming and long resounding thunders of ndemnation for any man who will stand a Christian pulpit and assail the more an virgin purity of inspiration, the well loved daughter of God?

Expurgate the Bible! You might as well to the old picture galleries in Dresden d in Venice and in Rome and expurgate e old paintings. Perhaps you could find foot of Michael Angelo's "Last Judg- ent" that might be improved. Perhaps u could throw more expression into Rap- el's "Madonna." Perhaps you could put ore pathos into Rubens' "Descent from e Cross." Perhaps you could change e crests of the waves in Turner's "Slave hip." Perhaps you might go into the old alleries of sculpture and change the forms d the posture of the statues of Phidias and raxiteles. Such an iconoclast would very on find himself in the penitentiary. But is worse vandalism when a man proposes re-fashion these masterpieces of inspira- tion, and to remodel the moral giants of this gallery of God.

Now, let us divide off. Let those people who do not believe the Bible and who are crit- ical of this and that part of it, go clear over to the other side. Let them stand behind the devil's guns. There can be no compromise between infidelity and Christianity. Give us the out and out opposition of infidelity rather than the work of these hybrid theo- logians, these mongrel ecclesiastics, these half evoluted people, who believe the Bible and do not believe it, who accept the mira- cles and do not accept them, who believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures and do not believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures— trimming their belief on one side to suit the scepticism of the world, trimming their be- lief on the other side to suit the pride of their own heart, and feeling that in order to dem- onstrate their courage they must make the Bible a target and shoot at God.

There is one thing that encourages me very much, and that is, that the Lord made out to manage the universe before they were born, and will probably be able to make out to manage the universe a little while after they are dead. While I demand that the antagonists of the Bible, and the critics of the Bible go clear over where they belong, on the devil's side, I ask that all the friends of this good Book come out openly and above board in behalf of it. That Book, which was the best inheritance you ever re- ceived from your ancestry, and which will be the best legacy you will leave to your children when you bid them good-by as you cross the ferry to the golden city.

Young man, do not be ashamed of your Bible. There is not a virtue but it com- mends, there is not a sorrow but it com- forts, there is not a good law on the statute book of any country but it is founded on these Ten Commandments. There are no braver, grander people in all the earth than the heroes and the heroines which it biog- raphizes.

Of all the works of Dore, the great artist, there was nothing so impressive as his il- lustrated Bible. What scene of Abrahamic faith, or Edenic beauty, of dominion Da- vidic, or Solomonic, of miracle, or parable, of nativity, or of crucifixion, or of last judg- ment but the thought leaped from the great brain to the skilful pencil, and from the skilful pencil to canvas immortal. The Louvre, the Luxembourg, the National Gal- lery of London compressed within two vol- umes of Dore's illustrated Bible. But the Bible will come to better illustration than that, my friends, when all the deserts have become gardens, and all the armories have become academies, and all the lakes have become Gennesarets with Christ walking them, and all the cities have become Jeru- salems with hovering Shekinah; and the two hemispheres shall be clapping cymbals of divine praise, and the round earth a foot- light to Emanuel's throne—that, to all lands, and all ages, and all centuries, and all cycles will be the best specimen of Bible illustrated.

AN INFIDEL ON HIS KNEES.

At a recent evangelical gathering in Lon- don, Rev. R. M. Thornton, D.D., related this incident: "There were two men who frequented Regent's Park, London, one of whom carried a chair from which they har- angued the crowd on anti-Christian sub- jects. The three children of one of these infidels were taken ill, and were thought to be dying. A missionary heard of it, and though he had been often insulted and re- viled in public by the man, he went to him in his trouble. After he had been with the children a little while, he asked of their fa- ther leave to pray with them. Receiving no answer, the missionary went down on his knees, and as he rose he found that the father had followed his example. On a re- cent Sunday that man and his friend who carried the chair appeared at my hall, and both remained to the end of the service, the father staying to the inquiry meeting after- wards. He may have come to scoff in the first instance, but at all events he remained to pray. Kindly sympathy, under God's blessing, had won the unbeliever over to the side of Christianity."

Korea's Heathen Gods.

Their Name is Legion, but Christianity is Winning its Way.

THERE is a great field for missionary effort in Korea, which is now made available to the workers, through the results of the recent Chino-Japanese war. The obstacles to Christian progress in Korea have never yet been rightly understood by those who have not themselves traveled in that country. The Seoul "Repository" enu- merates some of them. It says:

"Chief among them is ancestor-worship, the State religion, which has the Confucian code as its ethics. The hold which this possesses on a Korean can hardly be over- estimated: a hold which cannot be loos- ened without shaking the very foundations of his being. Ancestor-worship has its roots in the most sacred soil of human re- lations, that of parent and child. This system forms the base of a Korean's educa- tion. It permeates both national and indi- vidual life. It appears to enjoy the volun- tary, hearty, and unanimous indorsement of public opinion; the nobility and aris- tocracy adorn it, the wealthy lay their best homage at its shrines. Ancestor-worship, however, ignores the supernatural element in religion. This the Korean has found in a system of spirit-worship known as Sham- anism. This system postulates the exist- ence and immanence of innumerable spirits who correspond to the old Greek demons. They are not necessarily evil, but they con- trol the affairs and fortunes of men. They rank all the way from the 'Tok-gabi'—the hobgoblin whose nightly gambols are the subject of many a ghost story—to "Tai Chang Kun,' Lord of the spirit world, whose throne fills a quarter of the heavens. Pausus and Mudangs, priests and prest- esses of this cult in every section of the land, are living sponsors for these tenets and stand ready to exorcise or propitiate for a proper compensation. About these spirits there has grown up a system of ob- servances, ceremonies, and festivals which, coming round both periodically and occa- sionally, form quite an event in the routine of Korean life. Offerings are made and rites observed at such times which entail an amount of expense and credulity against which many a Korean rebels. Some of these spirits are household gods, repre- sented by fetishes—a bundle of straw, a paper of rice, a gourd, an old pot, or a cast- off shoe, hung in a conspicuous place to stand for a supernatural conception. More than once we have been asked to destroy fetishes rotten with age, by those who de- sired to break with them but were afraid to touch them themselves.

"When the Korean approaches Christi- anity, it means a step which only a coura- geous man can take. He finds he is called upon to step aside from the religious path followed by the entire mass of his country- men, and espouse a system whose follow- ers as yet are but a handful, and these of humble origin. To his friends he seems as one who has not only apostatized from the views decreed by public opinion (a serious offence all the world over), but as also hav- ing cast off all allegiance to his parents and ancestry, thus violating one of the funda- mental precepts of ordinary morality. He is completely ostracized. Ancestor-worship is an ever-present factor in Korean life, and no Korean can get beyond the sphere of its influence. Possibly the whole thing is summed up in the remark made by a troubled parent, 'If I am to be treated thus after death, what is the use of children?'

"Our category of obstacles is not yet complete. The dignity of labor is a Chris- tian, not a Korean, idea. That manual labor in one's personal support is more hon- orable than enjoying the hospitality of a relative or friend is regarded as a peculiar view to hold, but that birth does not incapa- citate one from earning his living by the sweat of his brow does violence to a lead- ing Korean social canon, that of caste dis- tinction."

CONSTANTINOPLE'S Y. M. C. A.

Constantinople has a Young Men's Christian Association which meets in Som- erville House, Pera, twice a week during the winter months. During the past season the subject of Sunday evening study has been "The Period of the Judges." Meet- ings during the week have been devoted to foreign missions, when collections were made for the Church Missionary Society and the London Missionary Society. The attendance and membership are increasing.

OUR CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

II.—CARRIE A. LEHMANN.

BY a strange law of our be- ing, the best things in us reach activity and frui- tion through suffering. It was so with the subject of this sketch. The work for Christ which she has done and is doing had its origin in a time of intense sorrow. Some years ago, she stood by the bed of her be- loved son, who was on the verge of death. The mother's heart in her yearned over him, but more and stronger than her desire for his life, was her longing that he might be brought to Christ. She pleaded with him and for him, and there and then, in her agony of desire, she consecrated her future life to service for Christ. She realized in that time of distress what it meant to die without Christ, and she knew that what it meant for her boy, it meant for multitudes dying around us every day. God merci- fully heard her prayers for her son's con- version. Three weeks before the end came, he gave his heart to God, trusting peace- fully in the Saviour. The sting of death the bitter smart of bereavement, the mother could not feel. It was natural that she should grieve, but she sorrowed not as those who have no hope. Her joy that her pray- ers had been answered outweighed her grief, and she thanked God and took cour- age.

The work that grew out of that ordeal has been very blessed. Mrs. Lehmann en- tered upon it in a spirit of solemn consecra- tion. She had been familiar with Gospel truth from her earliest years. Her grand- parents, to whose charge she had been committed when in her infancy she was be- reaved of her mother, were pious people, members of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and they gave her a careful re- ligious training. The truth took deep root in her heart and was now to bear abundant fruit. Speaking recently of that time, she said: "My heart was filled with a hunger for souls, especially for those of boys and girls about the age of my dear dead boy." In the town of New Albany, Ind., where she lived, there were many such young people, and she began reaching out after them. The work was tentative at first, but gradually as God blessed her efforts, a mis- sion was organized where numbers of them were gathered on Sunday afternoons to lis- ten to her teaching. Services were held on three evenings in the week, and a Mothers' Meeting was formed. This has been very successful. There is now every week an average attendance of forty women, many of whom have been won for Christ and are training their families for him. Mrs. Leh- mann calls herself the Superintendent of the Mission, but she is more than that; she is its life and spirit. Christian people who have seen what she is doing have lent their aid, so that a benevolent and philanthropic work has been added to that distinctively spiritual. During last winter, bread, gro- ceries and coal were distributed under Mrs. Lehmann's care at her Mission, and many poor people were fed there. She has had the gratification of seeing twelve persons who were converted at her Mission, unite with various churches during the past four months, and there are others preparing for that step.

THE SAVIOUR'S PARTING WORDS.

S. S. Lesson for June 23. Luke 24: 44-53. Golden Text Matt. 28:19. By Mrs. Baxter.

THEY were one message, those parting words of Jesus before he, the risen Saviour ascended into heaven. Yet how differently rendered by those to whom they were committed on behalf of the church of all time! All the four evangelists agree as to the main point: Go ye. Matthew renders it: "Go ye therefore and make disciples of all the nations." Mark: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature (or to the whole creation. R. V.) Luke: "Repentance and remission of sin should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning from Jerusalem, and ye are witnesses of these things;" John: "As the Father hath sent me, even

So Send I You."

The circumstances attending the utterance of this command by our beloved Lord are variously related: Matthew distinctly states that it was in Galilee whither the disciples had resorted in obedience to the command of Jesus (Matt. 28: 10, R. V.): "Go tell my brethren that they depart unto Galilee, and there shall they see me." That this command was obeyed, and this promise fulfilled, we have already seen in the incidents which happened in Galilee. But Mark makes it to be "when they sat at meat, and Jesus appeared unto them and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen." Luke, who does not mention the manifestation of the risen Christ to his disciples in Galilee, writes as though his message were spoken, not to the eleven only, but also to "them that were with them." (Luke 24, 33), perhaps the same hundred and twenty on whom the Holy Ghost came on the day of Pentecost (Acts 1: 15); and his account would lead to the conclusion that it was in Jerusalem, on the resurrection evening, after the two disciples were returned from Emmaus. The Apostle John makes it to be the very same occasion (John 20: 19-23). May it not have been that a message of such moment was given more than once, perhaps on several occasions and in different words? To Matthew with his special eye to the Kingdom, one can understand how he would catch and perpetuate Christ's teaching about the discipling of nations, while Mark, who saw him as the Servant and the Sacrifice, would lay hold on the detail which would be adapted to his view of things; he saw all in the way in which it touched individuals; "every creature." But the one command does not nullify the other. Let some touch nations as did Joseph and Daniel of old, let some work with individuals, as our Lord did with Nicodemus and the woman of Samaria, but let all, every quickened soul, do his part or hers, to turn men "from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God."

It was like making his will when the Lord Jesus left to his disciples his place of testimony. He had come as the Word which "was from the beginning" as the [illegible] he had been to them; God filled images of him who was the image of the Father. It is a wondrous heritage which we come into, not only by his death for us, but our own death to him and to ourselves in him. He was to the world the living sample of all which the Old Testament declared God [illegible] world as he was" ignored, and hated, and hated, and rejected as he was, by the world. But he has sent us with a word backed by the authority of his presence, which he has made to be "living and powerful and sharper than any two-edged sword." His Father sent him with the Word and with the Spirit; and as the Father sent him so he sends us. The unlearned and ignorant men who astonished the ecclesiastical dignitaries of Jerusalem (Acts 4: 13) had with them no other power than the Word and the Spirit.

The kingly-minded Matthew, who sees the nations as the field of operation, and who, looking beyond the mere preaching of the Gospel grasped the idea that evangelized people must samples of the truth they learned, saw the authority and presence of Christ as the deep necessity for such a work. Thus the special words of Christ which he alone records, are: "All authority had been given unto me in heaven and in earth." "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world (or consummation of the age)." Matt. 28. So authorized, so accompanied, "Go ye, therefore, and make disciples of all nations, baptizing (i. e., bringing them) into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them, not only what to believe, but also to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." This is one side, and a most important one, but it is not all. For nations, for families, for missions, for schools, for people taken collectively, this is the essence of true evangelizing: but individuals need yet more.

Mark, with his strong individuality, his eye for details, records other words of his Master. Matthew remembered that Jesus had said: "Go ye." Mark records where the sent ones should go. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature (or the whole creation)," Mark 16: 15. Leave no one out, pass over no place, explore that ye may preach the Gospel, penetrate everywhere, your message is to every man. Dealing with baptism he sees the other side. In the words of Christ, given by Matthew, the evangelist is to be responsible, "Go ye," "baptize ye." In those given by Mark, "He that believeth and is baptized," is the responsible party, he shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be condemned.

With such a message to individuals it is not so much the declaration of the authority of God which is needed, but the unanswerable manifestation of his power. "And these signs shall follow them that believe, in my name shall they cast out devils, they shall speak with new tongues, they shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them. They shall lay hands upon the sick and they shall recover." And should those be right who would expunge this passage from the canon of Scripture, we nevertheless find it acted upon again and again in the Acts of the Apostles. When Peter and John returned from the presence of the rulers and elders and scribes, threatened and commanded to speak no more in the name of Jesus, they pray for boldness to speak the Word by the accompaniment of

These Very Signs:

"While thou stretchest out thine hand to heal; and that signs and wonders may be done in the name of thy holy Servant, Jesus." (Acts 4: 29, 30, R.V.) Luke sets a high value upon the Word. In only one chapter of his Gospel, he records how the Lord Jesus met the tempter with the Word: "It is written." Soon after his own reading of the Word in the synagogue, at Nazareth, and again at Capernaum. In all this Luke makes the Word prominent as he does in this last message.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THREE accounts are given of the Ascension, two of which are by Luke. In Mark's Gospel there is the brief statement that Jesus was received up into heaven and sat down at the right hand of God. In Luke's Gospel there are more details; but there is the strange difficulty that the natural inference from the story as it is there given, would be that the Ascension took place on the day of the Resurrection. The events of that day are recorded and the story of the Ascension follows immediately, without any suggestion that there was an interval. The appearances in Galilee are not even mentioned. In the Acts, where the third account appears, and which it is believed Luke wrote, the interval of forty days is mentioned, but still nothing is said of the journey to Galilee and the appearances there. It may have been that Luke did not go to Galilee, and speaks only of what he himself witnessed in Jerusalem. Andrews thinks that Luke condenses his narrative in his Gospel because of his intention to write the later treatise in which he would more fully describe the Ascension. Regarding that event as the beginning of Christ's heavenly activity, he might have thought it more appropriate to place it as a preface to his record of apostolic work. Matthew and John give no account at all of the Ascension, although in two passages (John 6: 62 and 20: 17) John writes as if the fact were commonly believed. We can account for the silence of the Evangelists and the meagreness of the details in the works of the other two, as to the important event, only by supposing that the frequent appearances and disappearances during the forty days had led them to regard the resurrection life of Jesus as something appertaining more to heaven than earth, and that the Ascension was its natural culmination. Besides this, they wrote under the mistaken impression that Jesus would return almost immediately, and therefore that his departure was not to them the important matter that it appears to us. As to the place of the Ascension, there is now a general agreement that it must have been the Mount of Olives. If that is correct, Luke's remark that "he led them out as far as to Bethany," must be understood as reading, "over against Bethany," that is on the part of the Mount overlooking Bethany. As we have had occasion to point out, several times during this series of lessons, the Evangelists do not attempt to write a biography of Jesus, but to give such facts about him and his teaching a would tend to instil and increase faith i him as the Saviour of the world. Witl this as their object, they omitted much tha a biographer would have considered essen tial. As John says, if everything had bee recorded, the world could not have con tained the books that would be written That is, the literature of the life would hav been so voluminous that only people of leis ure could have mastered it, and so the en and aim of their writing would have bee defeated.

Then opened he their understanding. Jesu had been doing this for three years past, bu now, we suppose, he imparted miraculousl a great and permanent accession of ligh The opening of the understanding in ord nary matters is a process with which all ar familiar. It is the chief object of educatior which must be a failure if it is merely th acquisition of knowledge. The story is tol of a boy who spent a winter in Florida, an returned to his city home disgusted with th country he had been in. It was dull an stupid, he said. But during the next fe months he was under the charge of a teach er who was an enthusiast in botany, an he kindled the boy's interest in his favorit study. The boy learned about the wonde ful orchids and their strange life. His teach er took him to a conservatory that he migh see some of them growing. "You shoul see them in Florida," the teacher said, "bu these will give you an idea." The bo looked at him in amazement. "I have bee in Florida," he said, "but I never notice any of them." "Perhaps you did not loo for them," his teacher said, "but they woul not escape you now, that you know some thing about them."

Power from on high. "In driving piles, said Spurgeon, "a machine is used by whic a huge weight is lifted up and then falls o the head of the pile. Of course the highe the weight is lifted, the more powerful is th blow it gives when it descends. Now, we would tell upon our age, and come dow upon sin with ponderous blows, we mus see to it that we are lifted as near to God a we can get. All our power will depend up on the elevation of our spirits. Praye meditation, devotion, communion are th windlass to lift us aloft."

Ye are witnesses. A witness in a court o justice is required by the law of evidence t state facts within his own knowledge. is not necessary for him to explain or ac count for them; it is not competent for hi to repeat what some one has told him; wha the court wants him to do is to state wha he has seen and heard and done. When h has done that his veracity may be called i question, but his evidence remains for wha it is worth. Christ expects his people t take that position, and it is remarkable ho effective such testimony is. Men who hav sat unmoved under the most eloquent ap peals and the most clear and exhaustive ex planations of the Gospel, have been move to seek Christ by the testimony of son plain man, that he was once degraded an helpless in the grasp of some evil habit, bu that Christ delivered him when everythin else had failed. Every saved soul can te tify. Like the blind man in the Gospel wh was unable to meet the arguments of th priests, he can say, "One thing I know that whereas I was blind, now I see. There is never any fear of Christianity b ing overthrown while there are people read to testify of what Christ has done in the souls.

Tarry ye in the city. They were to wa in Jerusalem until the Holy Spirit gav them the power necessary for their worl The command was made an excuse by pleasure-loving young man for not turnin to God. "I am waiting, he said, for the Ho ly Spirit. You say I cannot get salvatio without that." He and the friend who wa urging him to seek salvation were walkin on the sea beach as they talked. "Look that ship," said the Christian, pointing one that was anchored a little way ou "What would the crew do if they wante to begin their voyage home? They woul pull up the anchors and spread the sail They could not make the wind come, bu they could spread their sails to catch when it does come. You are like the shi you are tarrying, but you are anchored a you have no sail set. That is not the wai ing attitude. The Spirit truly bloweth as listeth, but there has never been a case earnest, ardent desire for its influence, a companied by prayer, to which there ha been no response. That is the sail to se set that, and the Holy Spirit will come a take you into the kingdom of God."

IT FEEDS TWO THOUSAND DAILY.

ne Bowery Mission Adds another Valuable Feature to its Rescue Work—A Mammoth Restaurant where even the Poorest can Buy a Meal.

GREAT changes have taken place in the Bowery Mission and Young Men's Home withing the last two months. Its spiritual work has been steadily increasing week by week, nd the number of men, young and old, ho have been there induced to abandon areers of vice and idleness and begin the ew life, was never so great, during any rresponding period of the Mission's his- ory. On every hand, it is felt that a rich lessing has fallen upon the work and that grand future of Christian service is open the Mission as an agency for the rescue f those thousands of men who are adrift the great city and wholly beyond the each of the regular church organizations.

A precious source of spiritual benefit has een the Converts' Special Prayer-meeting n Sunday afternoons, between four and ve o'clock. During the week many letters re received from all parts of the Union, equesting the prayers of those who gather t these meetings. Sometimes it is for an ring son who has wandered from the fold nd is living in sin that the prayers of the Converts are solicited; again it may be for ne sick unto death, that spiritual life may ome through suffering. From parents and hildren, husbands and wives, pastors and eople, men and women in every calling nd position in life, hese requests come ith a straightforward arnestness in their appeal that admits of no enial and which demnstrates the abounding faith of the writers n the efficacy of righteous prayer.

Still another means of piritual refreshing for large number of men ho are truly anxious o lead better lives are he "Family Concerts," r regular Thursday vening and Sunday afernoon gatherings at hich Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, the wealthy volnteer evangelist, talks o the auditors in such way as to draw many enitent hearts to the oot of the Cross. This levoted Christian lady, hose remarkable work mong "the Lost Boys f the Bowery" was eferred to in a recent ssue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is indeatigable in her efforts nd her labors are reeiving a rich reward. The men love this noble-hearted woman, who eaves the comforts of her home and social ife to give them a elping hand to draw them to the Saviour. At the regular evening services of the Mission, which are always crowded even in hot weather, there have been numerous conversions, and the testimonies given nightly show how thoroughly the spiritual influence has permeated the lives of very many who have been led to Christ through the instrumentality of the Bowery Mission. During these two months, nearly 600 men have made public acknowledgment of saving belief, and a desire to begin the new life. It would almost seem as though a revival wave were passing over the Mission at the present time, which may result in sweeping large numbers of poor human waifs and strays into the fold.

But the Mission has also been growing in its secular work as well as on spiritual lines. It is like the tree described by the Psalmist, "planted by a river," whose well-watered roots are rapidly sending forth branches that afford shade and shelter to those who have grown weary by the wayside or who have fallen in the hard battle of life. It has been found necessary to make extensive additions to the sleeping quarters, and the dormitories have been enlarged, thoroughly renovated and painted, and are now a model of cleanliness and attractiveness. A large restaurant has been opened on the ground floor, where a substantial meal can be bought at nominal cost. A five-cent meal consists of oat-meal and milk, or pork and beans, or meat stew and three slices of bread, coffee, tea or a large glass of pure milk being served with any of the three dishes that may be chosen. A ten cent meal consists of soup, roast meat, vegetables, rolls, coffee, tea or milk and dessert. The food supplied is all of excellent quality, being in most respects equal to that served in first-class restaurants, and the meals are furnished at about one-fifth the usual cost. This the Mission can afford to do by buying supplies in large quantities wholesale, and adding the bare cost of fuel, lighting and labor.

As an illustration of the surprising growth of any work of helpfulness, the evolution of the Mission Restaurant is unique. As the Bowery Mission is situated in the very heart of that section of New York which is recognized as the familiar ground of the waif, the tramp, the criminal and the social outcast, and amid a network of saloons, it was believed that a clean and attractive restaurant, with home-like surroundings and which would supply a really substantial meal at absolute cost, would be the means of helping those who would otherwise spend their few pennies in the rum-shops. The first table was a plain board resting on two barrels, yet so attractive and strengthening was the fare, that in one week 3,200 men were fed there. Now, however, the restaurant has been equipped in a thoroughly substantial way; and its appointments and service are quite as good as those of many high-priced establishments. The pine plank has been superseded by a long oval counter, at which nearly 100 men can be simultaneously seated. Within the oval are the white-capped and white-aproned help, beside the shining nickeled boilers of tea, coffee and milk, and racks of tempting food. In the rear is the kitchen with its huge coppers, great ranges, and all the equipment suited to a large establishment.

Since the previous articles on this subject have appeared in these columns, people from all parts of the country have visited, and some have revisited, the Bowery Mission. They have gone home with delighted hearts, after seeing the work and hearing the remarkable testimonies given nightly. There are many indications that the Mission's period of widest and highest usefulness in the cause of Christ and humanity is yet to come, and this conviction is urging the managers and all who have the work at heart to press forward with energy and perseverance in ever widening lines. A number of readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have already sent in their names to be enrolled as patrons of the Bowery Mission, with the view of being identified with its spiritual work. Patrons may send an offering toward the support of the work, if so disposed, once a year, such offering to be purely spontaneous, and to be accepted as an evidence of the loving interest they feel in the Mission's welfare and its soul-winning efforts among falien men.

A WEDDING IN AFRICA.

OUR readers will remember that some months ago, when Mr. Walter T. Currie was in New York pursuing his study of medicine preparatory to his return to missionary work at Chisamba, in Equatorial Africa, we published his portrait with a history of his labors among the African tribes. A pleasant continuation of the story is the news of his marriage to a lady missionary at the American Board's station at Chisamba, which is Mr. Currie's sphere of labor. The "Missionary Herald" gives the following description of the ceremony furnished by one of the guests:

"We were all busy for a week beforehand: the girls were busy early and late pounding corn into meal for the wedding feast. The day before, two animals were killed and a good deal of the meat cooked, so as to be ready for the guests. We were much pleased and surprised at the arrival of the Rev. W. H. Sanders, of Kamundongo, who had come over for the event. Early in the morning the people began to arrive; first the women, with basket after basket of corn meal, gifts from the chiefs round about. By meeting time there was such a crowd, men old and young, women and children. The service began shortly after ten o'clock. The schoolhouse was packed, and the door and windows were full also, and yet not half inside. Mr. Sanders gave the address, after which the marriage took place; first the English service, Rev. F.W. Read officiating, then the Umbundu service, Rev. W. H. Sanders officiating.

"After the service the old men came up, one by one, and saluted Mr. and Mrs. Currie with their bow, clapping of hands and kalunga, the young men and women following them. As the old men do not care to eat in company, they received their share of the feast in raw meat and salt, which they carried home with them. The young men and women ate here, and such a noise and clatter of tongues, I never heard before. They all seemed to enjoy themselves and went away remarkably well pleased at what they had seen and heard.

"The day after the marriage the old men and others came to visit Mr. and Mrs. Currie. They are very particular about their etiquette, and after any feast or anything of that kind they always pay a visit."

THE SAVIOUR FOR ME.

THE Saviour who saw from his home in the sky
That from sin we should never be free,
And loved us so well that he came down to die,
This, this is the Saviour for me!

The Saviour who left all the glories of heaven,
And died a vile death on the tree,
That to us a bright crown and white robes might be given,
This, this is the Saviour for me!

The Saviour who loved all the little ones so,
And said as they pressed to his knee,
"Let them come unto me; suffer not one to go,"
This, this is the Saviour for me!

The Saviour who feels every sorrow we bear,
And asks us his children to be,
That safe he may keep us in his loving care,
This, this is the Saviour for me!

The Saviour who wants us to trust in his love,
And there we his glory shall see,
He'll guide us and guard us and take us above,
This, this is the Saviour for me!

FREEDOM OF WORSHIP.

NO man that ever lived did so much for the liberation of human thought and religious freedom as Martin Luther. But the world and the Church ever and anon needs another iconoclast to break ecclesiastical pretensions. In all ages and in all churches there have been those who would tyrannize the souls of the people. There are those who have supposed that the Catholic Church has had a monopoly of persecution. It is a great mistake. The Rev. Mr. Mather, a Protestant minister of Boston, advocated the burning of people supposed to be bewitched. Who burned the Quakers? Protestants. Servetus wrote books offensive to Protestanism, and was burned to death, and John Calvin is said to have sanctioned the awful tragedy. We want a new Martin Luther at least every fifty years to extirpate all spirit of religious tyranny. You see it ever and anon cropping out in all the denominations. Now, I am not so much opposed to one pope, if he be a good man, as I am opposed to these scores of little popes all over Protestantism. Methodist popes, Baptist popes, Episcopalian popes, Lutheran popes, Congregational popes, Presbyterian popes, and I will say that in this country it takes the least timber to make a pope of any country in the world. But ever and anon some one reads over the life and exploits of Martin Luther and catches his spirit, and there is another crash of consecrated humbug. Still, there are others who try to stop the age, and they throw a block in front of this wheel, and a block in front of that wheel, and try to pull off the driver's box the coachman. But you cannot stop the age in which we live. The only way to do is to keep up with it, and get on the box beside the driver and help him control the ten galloping coursers. In the harness of the Church there is too much breeching strap and not enough traces. But says some one: "Wouldn't you curb fanaticism?" Why, fanaticism dies of itself. It never lasts more than five or ten years. Robert Hall, in his essay on "Toleration," says, most tersely: "Nothing that is violent lasts long." And you and I know as well as Robert Hall that anything that is not wisely Christian has in it elements of destruction. But if a thing be of God, caricature it, denounce it, vote against it, legislate against it; but you might as well try to abolish the eternities. The principles of religious freedom, of which Martin Luther was the impersonation, will yet be [illegible] Here we are, in the evening of the nineteenth century, in a land where religious liberty is to correspond, or ought to correspond, with [illegible] Between these two [illegible] day of the Advent of the children, is to be demonstrated what a man may be if his religion is unmolested. The cradle of the human race was the Tigro-Euphrates basin. The cradle of its regeneration will be this continent. Why not Great Britain and Ireland? Their area is too small. Why not the Continent of Europe? Too many nationalities to be unified. Why not Asia or Africa? Their climates are unpropitious. Here in America I believe the work is to begin. Plenty of room. Enough rigors in our climate to energize the people, and enough of the balsamic to make everything genial.

RELIGION HEALTHY.

BAD men and women have short lives. That is a general rule. I know hundreds of good old men. I do not know a dozen bad old men. Why? They do not get old. That is a general rule. Lord Byron died at Missolonghi at thirty-six years of age, himself his own Mazeppa, his unbridled passions the horse on which he dashed out into the desert. Edgar A. Poe died at thirty-eight years of age, in Baltimore, and the raven that alighted on the bust above his chamber-door was delirium tremens; "only this and nothing more."

But you say, "Don't professors of religion sometimes go wrong? Don't professors of religion sometimes get intoxicated, and professors of religion misappropriate funds, and professors of religion make complete ship-wreck?" Yes, but they always throw away their religion before they throw away their morality. Mark the chronology. Because a man jumps overboard from a White Star line steamer in mid-Atlantic, is that anything against the capacity of the White Star line to take a man safely to Liverpool? Because a man jumps over the gunwales of his religion and goes down never to rise, is that anything against the capacity of the Christian religion to take a man clear through safely? In the one case, if the man had stuck to the steamer it would have been the salvation of the body; in the other case, if he had stuck to his religion it would have been the salvation of his morals.

Some of those who read this would have been dead twenty-five years ago but for the life-giving quality and life-preserving power of the Christian religion. You started life side by side with some other man. He had not the restraints of the Christian religion. You have had them. His body has been in the cemetery for years. The physician made it easy for his friends and said it was congestion of the brain; but the snakes that crawled through the room and the blue flies that went over showed what it was. You and he came side by side until you got to the golden pillar of the Christian life. You went to the right. He went to the left. That is the only difference between you and him—the self-preservative power of the Christian religion.

A CURE-ALL.

WHEN any earthly medicine is advertised as good for everything, you know it is good for nothing. The only medicine that hath in it curative power for all evils—social, domestic, national—is the Gospel. There is no quackery about that, for it is the compounding of the great Physician. That is the only cure-all the world has ever seen or will ever see. Do not allow yourself to get discouraged by this or that evil; but go to work to help cure it; appreciating that it is only a question of time when society and the world will become gloriously convalescent. Those who toil cheerfully will accomplish far more than those who toil despondingly. Against us may be all evil passions of men concerted and allied and intrenched and reinforced, but on our side are all good men and women, all good angels and Jehovah, and if God be for us, who can be against us? The God himself, who hath sworn that he will give all the kingdoms of this world to his Son for a possession, is going to manage the affairs of this world. It does not now seem so. It is, nevertheless, a chronological [illegible] world is nearer that superb and irradiating event than ever before, and every stitch of philanthropic needle and every kind word of Christian admonition, and every tear of sympathy and every smile of encouragement, and every earnest prayer, is toward that result a heaven-acknowledged and God-honored contribution. Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

R. G. Wallace, Clifton City, Mo. 1. Where was Matthew Henry buried? 2. What were the conditions under which his son died?

1. In Trinity Church, Chester, England. 2. His son was a member of Parliament, elected by the city of Chester. We do not know the conditions of his death, but he did not follow in his father's footsteps.

Subscriber, Asbury Park, N. J. Does the Bible prohibit a divorced man marrying again?

If his wife has been unfaithful to him it permits him to obtain a divorce and marry again. (See Matt. 5 : 32.) Some divines believe that it also permits divorce where the wife leaves her husband's home, and declares she will never return (see 1. Cor. 7 : 15), but all do not agree on that point.

Subscriber, Madoc, Can. Why was the sin referred to in John 19 : 11 greater than Pilate's sin?

Because the sin of the High Priest and his associates was a sin against light. They ought to have known better, and would have known better had they studied their Scriptures. Besides, they were the active promoters of the prosecution. Pilate would not have interfered but for their importunity.

E. C. Lang, Merna, Neb., writes:

In behalf of the needy of this community, I wish to return thanks to the many kind friends of the East, and your very kind appeal in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Words cannot express thanks for what you kind Christian people have done. If you could step into some of the homes and see the little ones that you have helped to make happy, I know your hearts would rejoice at the good work you have done.

J. P. W. Kilmichael, Mass. Do you consider that our Lord's victory was won on the Cross or in Gethsemane?

His victory over his own human nature was won in Gethsemane when he acquiesced in the approaching ordeal. We do not know what were all the elements of the conflict in the Garden, but that was sure to be one of them. It was a spiritual suffering. The ordeal on the Cross was physical, though even that was aggravated by the sense that he was deserted of God. Calvary was the culmination of his whole work, and therefore it was there that the victory was achieved.

F. E. Craig, Cook, Neb. Why do religious papers and ministers persist in using the name of Sunday in speaking of Sunday Schools and in other announcements, instead of using the Scriptural term, Sabbath?

Because the Sabbath was the Jewish term for the day of rest. Sunday does not fulfil the Jewish conception of it. The Sabbath was hedged about with all kinds of restrictions. A man must not light a fire on that day; must not walk over a certain distance; must not carry a handkerchief in his pocket, because it would be bearing a burden, and other nonsensical regulations. The Christian is under none of them, and spends his day of retirement from business in religious activity, not in Sabbatic rest. The best change of term would be to speak of it as the Lord's Day.

E. B. Gray. When and where were the first Children's Day Exercises held?

In 1865 it was suggested to the Centenary Committee of the M. E. Church to establish a Children's Fund for the Aid of Sunday Schools, and in 1868 the M. E. General Conference recommended that the second Sunday in June be annually observed as Children's Day. In subsequent years the London M. E. Conference, the General Conference of the Evangelical Association, the Presbyterian General Assembly, and the National Council of Presbyterian Churches followed this example. Some churches, however (and especially the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn,), have had a Children's Day observance long before any general recognition of the practice.

Inquirer, Mass. Suppose a man pledges himself to give a tenth of his income to the Lord's service, should he give a tenth of his gross receipts, such as the entire rent of a house he owns, or may he deduct expenses, like taxes and repairs, before reckoning a tenth?

The income is the net proceeds of his business or property. It is the amount at his disposal for personal and family use after paying business expenses. In trade the income is not the total receipts. Out of them must come the cost price of the goods sold, the rent of the store, the wages of clerks, &c. The balance is the income, a tenth of which the man has promised to give. In the same way the expenses of property have to be deducted from the rental, and the balance is income.

Inquirer, Carroll, Kan. You stated in THE MAIL-BAG recently that a wife has no right to give to charitable and religious objects money which is the joint property of herself and her husband, without the consent of her husband. Has she not a right to give such money without the wife's consent?

Neither party has a right to give away, without the consent of the other, money held in joint ownership. When all the income is contributed by the husband, he is apt to regard it as being not correctly characterized as joint ownership. In that case he often claims the right to give away what he chooses, without his wife's consent. We think that such right, even if it is legitimate, should not be exercised. He should remember that she has a claim on him for a provision in the event of his death, that really constitutes a moral joint ownership of the savings. She should therefore be consulted before any important gift is made, and if she has objections, they ought to have weight with him. If, however, the wife insisted on no money being given when the husband furnished the whole income, he would be justified in refusing to yield, and might rightly give the proportion sanctioned by Scripture, without her consent.

C. McL., Crinchau, Pa. Can a man receive eternal life without being baptized?

No one would be likely to wish to test the question. Christ commended it, and we would obey, even if it were a much greater thing to be done. We can conceive of cases in which baptism would not be possible. A man brought to repentance and faith when he was away from all Christians and dying before any Christian could baptise him is a case which might occur in foreign travel, or on a voyage. You do not suppose that God would exclude such a man from heaven! It is not likely that the dying thief was baptized, yet he had Christ's personal assurance of salvation. Your other question has been answered in a recent issue.

G. Robertson, Oakland, Cal. 1. At Christ's second coming will he be seen by every one in the world? 2. How long an interval will elapse between the coming of Christ to summon his waiting people and his coming in judgment?

1. Prophetic expositors are generally agreed in the opinion that none will see him but those whom he calls to meet him. All will see him when he comes with his saints in judgment. (See Rev. 1 : 7.) 2. It is thought about three and a half years. That is on the presumption that the withdrawal of the waiting church will occur "in the midst of the week," or final period of seven years. If, as some suppose, the withdrawal takes place at the beginning of the period, the interval, of course, will be seven years.

Inquirer, Scranton, Pa. 1. What language did our Lord use? 2. Were the Gospels written in Greek, and if so, could uneducated men have written them?

1. The common language of Palestine at the time was Aramaic. After the Babylonian captivity it supplanted the original Hebrew, although the latter continued in use for ecclesiastical documents. It is reasonable to believe that Christ used the Aramaic, as the people would not have understood him had he spoken any other language. 2. Matthew is commonly believed to have been written in Aramaic and the other three in Greek. The commercial and literary language of the day was Greek. Neither Luke nor John was an uneducated man. Both would be likely to know Greek. Mark too, as a young Jew of some standing, would probably know the language.

Chas. Davis, Kansas City, Mo. Is repentance indispensable to salvation, and must it precede faith?

Repentance means being sorry for sin and quitting it. We cannot conceive of a person exercising faith in Christ without feeling this emotion and making an effort to live without sin. The agony and distress you often see described in religious biographies is not indispensable. Many excellent Christians never experienced it. When faith is exercised, that distress ceases in any case, but the Christian never ceases to feel sorry for his sins, and to wish that he had never committed them. He also resolutely tries to avoid their repetition and seeks strength from Christ to resist temptation. Christ does not save people who want to continue living in sin, but people who show their real repentance by leading a new life, and he gives the power to do this to those who seek it.

J. Waite, ——. Does our Lord's admission (Mark 13 : 32 that he did not know the time of the end imply, as the Unitarians contend, that he was not divine?

No, the inference does not appear logical. We do not understand the union of the two natures in our Lord's person, and therefore cannot explain many of the difficulties which are presented. If, however, we take the conception that is given in the first chapter of John's Gospel of an Incarnation, we can perceive how there may have been restriction in the exercise of divine power operating by human brain. The instrument would be necessarily inadequate. The assumption of an unrestricted divine nature would imply perfect knowledge in boyhood, yet we know that as a boy Christ did not know all things; for Luke says explicitly (2: 52) that he increased in wisdom, which he could not have done had he been omniscient from birth. In taking our nature he voluntarily submitted to the imperfections of our condition, otherwise he would not have been made "like unto his brethren."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE DEAD STATESMAN.

DEATH robbed the nation of a faithful public servant, when on May 27, it seized Walter Q. Gresham for its prey. The news that Mr. Gresham was dead took the country by surprise. It was known that he was sick, but a fatal termination to the disease had not been apprehended. His strength appears to have been impaired by a too close attention to his duties as Secretary of State, and he was not in a condition to bear the attack of pleurisy which came upon him a few weeks ago. But even his physicians did not foresee the sudden collapse which ensued, and although everything that science could suggest as a restorative was tried, the fatal issue could not be averted. The tributes paid to Mr. Gresham's memory by his colleagues and associates show that his talents and character were of a higher order than the general public was aware and that he was respected most by those who knew him best. His career began in a small farm house near Paoli, Ind., where he was born in 1832. Of Scotch-Irish lineage on both sides, he inherited a vigorous constitution and a brilliant intellect. One of his ancestors was a warm friend of Methodism and made his house the place of entertainment for preachers and the preaching place until a Methodist church could be built. Mr. Gresham's father was Sheriff of his county and was murdered in the discharge of his duty when his distinguished son was only two years of age. A brief time at school, a clerkship, with opportunity to attend college, and then a call to the Bar, followed by an election to the Legislature, were the events that filled Mr. Gresham's career until the outbreak of the war. He enlisted as a private, rose to the rank of Major General and won the admiration alike of his superior officers and of the men. He was severely wounded in one of the battles before Atlanta and for nearly a year suffered excruciating pain and was barely saved from the misery of mutilation. President Grant made him a Judge and President Arthur made him first, Postmaster General and afterwards Secretary of the Treasury. Afterward he returned to the bench and left it reluctantly at the invitation of President Cleveland to become the chief of his Cabinet. Throughout his career in the army, on the bench and in the Cabinet, the most conspicuous feature of his character was his unflinching fidelity to his conscientious conception of duty. The clamor of the press, the pressure of friends and the assaults of enemies had no power upon him. Whether he was mistaken in his view of a situation or not, he could do his duty as he understood it, regardless of friend or foe. During his military career, a speculator who had influence with Gen. Grant went to him with an ingenuant complaint that Gresham had ordered him out of the lines and had threatened to put him in irons. Grant asked him if he was sure Gresham had made that threat. The speculator was quite sure. "Then," said Grant, "I should advise you to keep out of his way, for he will do it." On the Bench he resisted all the influence that could use and summarily removed a man from a receivership and put an honest man in his place. He made the bitterest foe of his life of a political colleague by advising the Grand Jury to indict him if they could get at the evidence. The same relentless rectitude characterized him in the Cabinet. Not all the influence that the Louisiana lottery could bring to bear on him, directly or indirectly, when he was Postmaster General, could turn him from his course. He went on ruthlessly until the lottery was excluded from the mails and received the death blow to its power. The nation can ill-afford to lose such a man—one who loved right and justice and abhorred all share or compromise with evil.

Sent for the punishment of evildoers and for the praise of them that do well. (1. Peter 2 : 14.)

In Arizona Death-Stone.

A member of a party of hunters lately returned from Arizona, has sent to the Philadelphia "Times" a story of an extraordinary stone to which Indian legend ascribes fatal power. The hunter says that while on a mountain pass nearly fifty miles north of the Needles, a goat of an almost extinct speecies was started. The hunters followed in hot pursuit, but the fleet-limbed little creature climbed up beyond their reach. Suddenly they saw it fall dead. They were climbing up after its body, when an Indian appeared at the entrance of a mountain hut. He gesticulated wildly, evidently warning them against going farther. They waited for him to approach, and then asked him what he meant. He said that the goat had been killed by the death-stone, and that any one touching it would share the same fate. He bade them watch a rattlesnake that was approaching the goat, and they saw the snake coil and writhe and finally die in agony. The ground around the rock on which the dead goat lay was covered with the bones of dead animals. The rock is a rough, jagged projection, of a deep blue color, rising abruptly out of a bed of shale. It is not more than seven feet high. It is seamed and ribbed with the marks of volcanic action. The hunters believe that it has some electrical properties, and allege that after the sun went down they could see scintillations of electric light proceeding from it. The Indians have some horrible legends about it, dating back hundreds of years, and originating with the visit of a stranger with supernatural powers who was ill-used by their tribe, and avenged himself through the death-stone. How much of the story is true, and how much is superstitious legend, it might be difficult to decide. It is not a matter of practical importance, as, according to the hunters, the death-stone is in an almost inaccessible pass where few people are liable to come on it by accident. There is, however, another Stone, of which the Bible speaks, that does concern every one, for it is as certainly the cause of destruction to some as of life to others.

THE LATE SECRETARY OF STATE, W. Q. GRESHAM.

Whosoever falleth upon that stone shall be broken in pieces. (Luke 20 : 18.) To whom coming as to a living stone . . . ye also as living stones are built up. (1. Peter 2 : 4.)

To Stop Steel Bullets.

A new bullet-resisting shield was tested last week at the shooting grounds at East New York, with astonishing results. The shield is composed of materials which are kept secret by the inventor. It is two inches thick, and a piece a foot wide and fifteen inches long weighs eleven pounds. Tests were made on it with explosives of foreign and domestic manufacture. In one test, a steel bullet fired from a small-bore rifle by an explosive giving a speed of two thousand feet a second, passed through a block of yellow pine sixteen inches thick and dented a steel plate behind it; but when fired at the shield, penetrated only one inch. When taken out it appeared to have been fused by the impact. In another test, a bullet that passed through a steel plate half an inch thick, when fired from a Winchester rifle, such as is used in the army, could penetrate the shield only one inch, though the same rifle and explosive were used at the same distance. The shield is covered with ordinary flannel, and the inventor declares that very little metal is contained in it, and that its weight and thickness may be reduced with safety. It may be used as a part of a soldier's uniform, or as a covering for ships and forts. The value of such a shield is obvious, and if it really does afford the protection that is claimed for it, there is no doubt about its being generally used in warfare. If a government provides it as part of the equipment of its soldiers, it would be suicidal for any of them to go into a battle without it. It often happens, however, that in spiritual conflicts the Christian is wounded only through neglecting to use the shield provided for him, which, as he is assured, will be his protection.

Above all, taking the shield of faith wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. (Eph. 6 : 16.)

A Ranch in Motion.

A strange misfortune that has befallen a ranch owner is reported by the San Francisco "Examiner." It says that the County Surveyor of Mendacino County a short time ago surveyed a claim on the slope of a mountain near a branch of Elk Creek. The settler erected a cabin, bought three cows and a flock of sheep and set to work on his claim. Last winter the rains in the district were unusually heavy. The register of the district showed a total rainfall of nearly fifty inches. There were also severe frosts on the mountain and the soaked soil became hard and caked. More rain fell with the thaw and the ground became spongy. It appears to have been on a rock bottom over which the water that drained from the soil flowed freely. The settler recently had business in the town, which kept him there a day or two. He was returning on horseback and had just come in sight of his home on the mountain side, when he was startled by a terrifying sight. The whole claim with the cabin, barns and stock was slowly sliding down the mountain like a glacier. It gathered speed as it proceeded and finally, with a roar like distant thunder fell into the creek. It completely dammed the creek and left the mountain side simply bare rock, without a trace of soil or vegetation. All the labor and time and money he had expended on the claim was wasted and he had cause to be thankful that his life was not sacrificed, too. A warning is given in the Bibte that the labors of ministers and teachers may be lost in the same way. Mere surface work such as is sometimes witnessed in the excitement of a revival and such too as under the name of popular preaching pleases the ear and the intellect, but does not reach the heart will have no lasting results. The fruits of all such labor will disappear. Only that work is permanent that is as true as the foundation.

If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon he shall receive the reward. (1.Cor. 3: 14.)

A Floral Prison.

A lady residing in New Orleans relates that some days ago the first humming bird of the season made its appearance in her garden, sipping indiscriminately from the wealth of sweets. Late in the afternoon she observed the little fellow hovering around a spike of annunciation lilies which had shot up perfectly laden with bells. The next morning early when she went out for a stroll through the garden she heard a fluttering and faint cheeping from the neighborhood of the lily bed. For some time she could see nothing to account for the faint sounds, but at last was astonished to discover that one of the lily belis had closed its petals, imprisoning the humming bird within. It is probable that the bird had buried its beak too far in and extracted so much honey as to cause the already fading flower to collapse suddenly, thus holding the little fellow close bound all night long. The bird could not know that in seeking the honey in the beautiful flower he was endangering his life. Perhaps had he known he might not have resisted the temptation. Even men who should know better and have been warned of their danger have lost their souls in a similar way.

Hear thou this thou that art given to pleasure . . . mischief shall fall upon thee; thou shalt not be able to put it off. (Isa. 47 : 8, 11.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. Newman Hall, D.D., the Eminent Clergyman and author was much gratified by the American congratulations which reached him on May 22, when he celebrated his seventy-ninth birthday.

Mr. George W. Leitch, Missionary of the American Board of Ceylon, is delivering a course of lectures on India with 100 stereopticon illustrations, in the leading churches of all denominations in San Francisco and vicinity to aid in raising funds for an undenominational Christian college, in Jaffna, Ceylon.

Rev. J. B. McMichael, D.D., is the New Moderator of the United Presbyterian Church. He is President of the College at Monmouth, Ill. The contributions of the church to Foreign Missions last year amounted to $20,794. There seems to be a prospect of union between that church and the Dutch Reformed Church in the near future.

An Italian Methodist Church, Founded through the Church Extension Society, was dedicated on Sunday, June 2, at 307 East One Hundred and Twelfth street, New York. The pastor is Rev. Filoteo Taglialatelia, of Naples, a graduate of Drew Seminary. This is the first Italian M. E. Church in New York, although it is estimated that there are over 30,000 Italians in the city. Dr. William Baldwin took part in the exercises.

Calvary Baptist Church, New York, has been holding a three days' celebration service in honor of the twenty-fifth anniversary of Dr. R.S. McArthur's ordination in the ministry of the Baptist Church. During the public meeting on the last evening of the celebration, the pastor was presented with a check for $5,000, as a token of the congregation's regard. The Baptist ministers of the city and several ministers of other denominations attended to congratulate the church and pastor.

At a Recent Sunday School Celebration in England the interesting fact was mentioned that Baron Selborne who died last month, had been a teacher in the School for twenty-two years. Even during the time he held the office of Lord High Chancellor, which carries with it the duty of presiding over the House of Lords, Lord Selborne was as regular and punctual in attending school as he was in Court and the House of Lords.

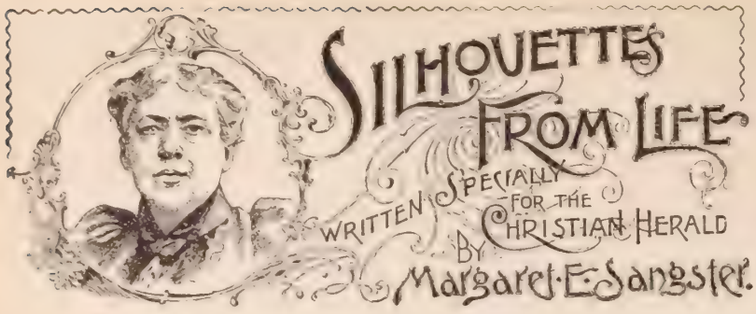
A Reliable Correspondent of "The Independent" in Eastern Russia reports that the evangelical movement which in the southern provinces goes under the name of Stundism, is making steady and continued progress, and notably in the Province of Orenburg, a district contiguous to Siberia. The late Czar's persecution of the Stundists had the result of scattering them all over the Empire, and wherever they went they propagated their faith. Even the exiles in Siberia have been making converts.

The Action of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in directing the Presbytery of New York to refuse to license graduates of Union Theological Seminary has aroused indignation in some prominent Presbyterian ministers. Dr. C. H. Parkhurst said of it: "The General Assembly has done something for which its successors in time to come are going to hang their heads in shame. There is a narrowness and meanness about it, and there is in it a resort to small ways and methods that are unworthy of the Presbyterian Church."

An English Judge in Sentencing an Incorrigible offender recently, gave utterance to an astonishing prediction. He said that he believed when society, in the course of years, became more civilized, it would adopt a different method of dealing with wrongdoers whom ordinary punishments failed to reform. He thought such persons would be put into a lethal chamber where they would mercifully and painlessly die. The judge might change his mind if he were to spend an evening in the Bowery Mission and listen to some of the testimonies of persons who were once regarded as incorrigible.

A Thriving Church has Grown out of a Quiet work commenced a year ago by Rev. G. E. Talmage and Rev. H. M. Cox. A neglected neighborhood lies between their two parishes in the north of New York City. It is remote from both, and about an equal distance. The two ministers commenced a Sunday School in the basement of a private house there last June. Preaching was commenced in the winter, Mr. Talmage and Mr. Cox taking the service on alternate Sunday afternoons, this being in addition to the services in their own churches. A large building has now been rented, a church organized, a pastor installed, and $500 a year pledged by the members toward the expenses.

An Effort to Raise Money to Put New Pews in the First Presbyterian Church at Port Jefferson, L. I., has developed a spirit of unusual service among the young lady members. They undertook to raise a certain proportion of the required sum, and that not by begging, but by labor. One lady invested in blacking and brushes and shined the shoes of her father and brothers, receiving the usual nickel a pair. Some of her male friends who heard what she was doing, jokingly offered to be customers, too. She consented, but raised the price for outsiders to a quarter. She soon had as many customers as she and her sister could attend to. Another lady made an excellent salve, which commanded a ready sale. A third lady gave a lecture. A fourth made cakes, another undertook laundrywork, and so on. The entire amount was raised in these ways.



AN EVENING HYMN.

THE soft glow of a lingering summer dusk was touching the roofs of the village and tinting the fields and hills with a faint hue of rose. Mrs. Armstrong, standing by her gate, watching for her husband who had been away on business in a neighboring city and was expected by the last train, saw walking up the street, a stranger queerly dressed, and it seemed, ill at ease and anxious to avoid observation.

Strangers seldom appeared in Middleborough, which was an out-of-the-way place tucked in among the hills. This man's clothing was of a fashion quite out of date—singularly so; his shoes were dusty, his hair worn very short, was a gray thatch, thick-growing and standing up like a brush; but he was not old, not more than forty, Mrs. Armstrong decided.

Wondering who he was, as he came timidly toward her, she was a little startled when he spoke to her, taking off his hat with shy politeness.

"Madam," he said, "Have you any work that I could do?"

"I am sorry," she answered, "that I have not any, but you look weary: will you come in and rest? My husband will be here directly."

"Thank you," he said, after a moment's hesitation, "I have walked far to-day. I am tired and hungry, and have little money. I will accept the first kindness that has been shown me in twenty years."

Mrs. Armstrong led the way into her little parlor, and offered her guest a chair by the window. He pushed it back, so that he could not be seen from the outside by anyone entering the little yard. Presently, while his hostess was stepping briskly to and fro, preparing supper, he leaned his head back against the cushion and fell asleep, the sleep of a fagged-out and weary man, who had tramped the roads for hours.

"Belle! Belle!" Mr. Armstrong's cheery voice resounded through the small entry. "Where are you, dear? I sold the meadow-lot at a splendid bargain; I have the money here in my pocket—three hundred dollars in hard cash. What do you think of that?"

"Sh-sh-sh—" said the wife, hastily and anxiously, indicating to her husband, as he entered, the sleeping figure in the corner. Mr. Armstrong's lips shaped themselves into a surprised whistle, but he made no sound. Belle drew him into the little bedroom off the parlor, and shut the door; they conversed in whispers.

"Did I do wrong to ask him in, Jonathan?" she said wistfully. "The poor fellow looked so haggard and tuckered out; I did it before I thought."

It was a region and a period when hospitality was more spontaneous and much more generally practised than in these suspicious times, and Mr. Armstrong's answer was prompt.

"Wrong? Certainly not. You are always in the right, wife. Still, I wish this money were safe in the bank, and not in my charge to-night, with a duffer like that under our roof. If only I hadn't shouted my news out as I did when I came in!"

"That doesn't matter, dear," responded Mrs. Armstrong. "The poor man was certainly asleep. He never moved a muscle."

Mr. Armstrong said no more. A suspicion which he did not communicate to his wife had crossed his mind, and he felt distinctly uncomfortable, thinking of the six fifty-dollar bills, crisp and new, reposing [illegible] But he was a brave man, and also a Christian, [illegible] the text he and Belle had read together that morning, "There shall no evil befall thee." Belle called him to supper, and he went out, extended a cordial hand to the stranger guest, showed him to the little dainty upper room, kept fresh and neat for company, and when presently the man came down, washed and refreshed, the three sat down to their evening meal. It was abundant and savory.

There were fried chicken, and hominy, boiled potatoes bursting from their jackets, preserves, marmalade, bread and butter and honey, with such coffee as only a good housekeeper knows how to make. The stranger feasted heartily, yet with an air of unfamiliarity which the keen eyes of Mr. Armstrong noted. Associations stamp us in this world as the soft metal takes the dye, and this stranger had lost the confidence and alertness, which contact with our fellows, the loving and the beloved, invariably imparts. But his host was only the kinder.

Under the influence of Mr. Armstrong's agreeable manner, the odd guest thawed, and became so to speak, friendly and social. Once he laughed, but checked himself quickly.

"It is our custom to have family worship and we will be glad to have you join us," said Mr. Armstrong, as he took the hymn-book after supper, and his wife went to the little melodeon, sat down and played. Husband and wife sang well, and their voices blended in

> Sun of my soul, thou Saviour dear,
> It is not night if thou be near,
> Oh, may no earth-born cloud arise
> To hide thee from thy servant's eyes.
> If some poor wandering child of thine,
> Have spurned to-day the voice divine,
> Now, Lord, the gracious work begin,
> Let him no more lie down in sin.

Tears blurred the stranger's vision. He put up a slender but work-worn hand, and furtively dried his eyes.

Mr. Armstrong read a few words from the Gospel of John, then they knelt and a hearty prayer was offered. The worship over, the guest was escorted to the clean, sweet-smelling, spare chamber, and left to his night's repose.

Next morning, after a good breakfast, he bade his kind entertainers farewell, and was about to proceed on his way. Mr. Armstrong inquired its direction, and, finding that he was bound eastward, gave him a lift for some miles in his wagon, and finally parted with him, with a cordial God-speed. After which Mr. Armstrong deposited his money in safety in the bank, and returned to his home.

"Belle," he said, "that man is a discharged convict. For some crime or other, he has spent the best years of his life in prison. I knew it by many little signs, most of all by that step, and that way of acting as if watched."

"Jonathan!! And you let him sleep here, when we had three hundred dollars in the house, and he might have robbed and murdered us both. Why, husband, how could you sleep as you did, knowing that?"

"I trusted God, Bella. And I hope a new life will begin for that poor fellow, but he's got a hard road before him. I wish I could have helped him better than I did."

A fortnight later, Mr. Armstrong received a letter from a distant city. It ran thus:

"DEAR SIR:—The stranger who ate your bread and slept in your house some days ago was a poor Ishmael, his hand against every man's, and every man's hand against him. He had spent twenty years in State prison, and coming out, felt he had not a friend in the world. You and your wife have saved him. He went from your door straight to the house of a kinsman whom he had feared to meet. He has work and friends now, and has begun an honest life. But let him tell you that he was tempted to steal the money you brought home from the sale of the meadow-lot, and perhaps he would have done it, but for your great goodness, and your family prayer. He is a saved man, thank God, and he owes it to you."

From Abraham's Country.

Elias S. Georges, a Young Mesopotamian Missionary and His Work.

GEOGRAPHERS and travelers tell us but little, in these days, of Mesopotamia, the land of Abraham, the father of the Patriarchs, whence old Egypt derived much of its learning, and almost all the knowledge of the sciences it possessed. In the great work of evangelizing the world, Mesopotamia has been well-nigh forgotten; yet there are to-day in the old, time-worn cities of that country men and women who know the Saviour, and who are so living that their very presence is an epistle of light to those around them.

Elias S. Georges, a young native of the city of Mardin, between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, is now on a visit to this country, where he is studying with a view to fitting himself for missionary work in his native land. Mr. Georges is the son of Christian Mesopotamian parents, his father and mother both being members of the Congregational Church at Mardin. The son was educated in the native schools, and after a short term in college there (he had already acquired a mastery of the English language), he resolved to devote his life to missionary work. In 1893 he began his duties at the mission station of Busrah, a point between the Arabian and Persian Gulfs, and in the territory known as the Arabian Mission, which is under the control of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of America. There his work was largely that of a Bible colporteur and traveling missionary. He spent some five months in this occupation, and eventually opened a shop in Busrah for the sale of Bibles. On his tours, in which he was associated with another native worker, he traveled over the Persian Gulf, stopping at different cities and villages, talking with Mohammedans, soldiers, Arabs, and others as opportunity offered.

"I know," said Mr. Georges, "that there is a common impression that converts from Mohammedanism are rare; yet I know many Mohammedans who have become Christians. One man—a collector of customs—studied the Bible and was converted. When he went to Bagdad, sometime afterward, he was arrested by the authorities and put in prison, for his desertion of the Mohammedan faith. He is still in custody there, and not allowed to leave the city or to preach the Gospel. I hear that when he is liberated he will surely go back to Busrah, and preach there. Another Mohammedan from Beyrout, became a Christian, worked as a missionary in Arabia, and died there under peculiar circumstances. Many of his friends knew all the facts concerning his change of belief. After his death they locked up his room and took his body and buried it among the Moslem dead. He was a martyr, I fully believe.

"Any man who changes his religion there stands a chance of being put to death," continued Mr. Georges. "Even if he is not killed, he is troubled at every hand. Should he take the Bible and go out and preach in the public street, they will surely kill him. They have annoyed me in Busrah many times and taken the book from me. Yet, in spite of all opposition, I know that our converts from Mohammedanism usually stand stanch and true."

The present condition and outlook of Gospel work in Mesopotamia are encouraging. In Mosul and Mardin, there are excellent mission schools, those in Mosul being under the Presbyterian Church and the Mardin schools, Congregationalist. At the latter place Pastor Hedai has a congregation of about 250 persons, and an organization which has been in existence about twenty-five years. At Mosul, Pastor Yusuf, a Presbyterian, has probably 150 congregation. Both are eloquent and devoted preachers of the Word.

There is no regular church in Arabia, but only evangelistic work. The little groups of Christians at different points are not large enough or rich enough to build churches. There is, however, a house for the American missionaries at Busrah, where the worshippers may meet, and regular service are held there on Sundays.

Among those who have done noble service in connection with the Arabian missi are Joseph Cantine, Samuel Zweimer, a Peter Zweimer. For a time there was medical missionary also at work, but returned invalided after a short term of s vice. EARLY GOSPEL WORK IN MEXICO.

A READER in Independence, Mo., writes the following interesting letter regarding early Christian work among the people of Mexico:

"The article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 22d, entitled, 'Gospel Progress in Mexico,' is very interesting to every lover of the Gospel on account of the valuable information secured from Mr. Butler and Dr. Powell for Mr. Moody, and through him communicated to your readers.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's visit, besides procuring for us such information at Dr. Powell was able to give, was instrumental in doing good otherwise. They encouraged the Missionaries and others who listened with great interest to the precious teaching of the one, and the sweet strains of music from the other, in their meetings at Toluca and City of Mexico—so that those Gospel workers went back to their respective charges with renewed zeal and earnestness. Less than thirty years ago such utterances of Mr. Moody, and his meetings, would have cost them their lives. Dr. Powell in his letter speaks of the origin of Protestantism in Mexico as dating back to the passage of the army in its march from the Rio Grande in New Mexico to that in the year of 1847. Doubtless this is correct as Bibles, and Testaments, and tracts were distributed easily enough along the route passed over. Eight or ten years before that time, however, the writer was privileged by gifts from the Bible and Tract Societies, and other sources, to do some good in that line here at home. Independence, in those days, was the entrepot to Mexico and the Western plains, and annually and semi-annually caravans passed to and fro. Merchandise was conveyed by pack mules, and wagons drawn by mules and oxen. The trade at first was in the hands of Americans, but later on Spanish and Mexican traders from Mexico, Chuahua, Durango and Zacatecas, with large numbers of Mexicans as employees became competitors for the trade. On arrival here the principals, or owners of the trains went east to purchase their supplies, leaving all their employees, or servants in and around Independence to take care of their stock and to make preparation for the return trip. We were thus brought into contact with both principals and servants, and as opportunities offered, we made distribution of the Scriptures and tracts in the Spanish and English languages. They were gladly received, and many of them seemed to prize them highly. The Mexicans took care not to let the priests see or find them out, as we learned afterward.

Eight or ten years later, the writer, with others, had occasion to go into Mexico, and on arrival at Santa Fe, we found what we had done here was not lost. A day or two after our arrival there, a few of us got together in an old adobe house, within a stone's throw of the oldest Catholic church in the country, and not far from a new and modern one: with saddles and mule trappings for seats we held a prayer-meeting for an hour or two with much comfort and gratification. This was the first Protestant prayer or religious meeting ever held either in New or Old Mexico.

A DEAF MUTE'S FAITH.

A lady, Mrs. M. B., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this touching incident: "Six weeks ago a dear brother died. He was a deaf mute from the effects of fever. For a month before he died he was very happy, and about an hour before his spirit fled he told his wife, 'I will die soon; I see Jesus; I can't stay long,' and he bade her good-bye. With his slim, wasted fingers he signalled soon: 'Jesus is here, and I am so happy.' He closed his eyes and passed away. His wife asked him a question, but death had robbed him of earthly sight, and he made no reply.

BÆDA'S LAST WORK ON EARTH.

One of the most tragic, yet glorious, incidents in the history of English literature, is that recorded of the death of Bæda, (the "venerable Bede") who is known as the father of English history. The aged man, while engaged in translating the Gospel of St. John, in A. D., 755, became mortally ill. Often, as his sickness increased, he spent the whole day at his work, dictating to an amanuensis. The closing hour came at last. "There is still a chapter wanting," said the scribe, as the morning drew on, "and it is hard for thee to question thyself longer." "It is easily done," said Bæda; "take thy pen and write quickly." Amid tears and farewells the day wore on to eventide. There is one sentence unwritten, dear master," said the boy. "Write it quickly," bade the dying man. "It is finished now," said the scribe, at last. "You speak truth," said the master, "all is finished now." His head supported in his scholar's arms, his face turned to the spot where he was wont to pray, Bæda chanted the solemn "Glory be to God," As his voice reached the close of his song he passed quietly away.

APOCALYPTIC FIGURES.

The Imagery of the Book of Revelation Typical of Events in Earth and Sky at the Close of the Dispensation.

BY WILLIAM MAUDE.

THE great drama of the Apocalyptic judgments, even when considered merely as a series of symbolic visions seen by the inspired seer of Patmos, while rapt "in spirit on the Lord's-day," stands alone in the range of universal literature for the sublimity of its imagery, as well as for the awe-inspiring character of its action. That imagery is borrowed alike from the heavens above, from the earth beneath, and even from the dark regions under the earth. Heaven, earth, and hell are laid under contribution for figures by which to set forth the greatness of the Divine purposes, the grievousness of the Divine judgments, and the glory of the Divine issue. And yet this imagery is never either unworthy or incongruous; it never sinks below the dignity of the solemn theme; it never, with the one possible exception of the wild beast having seven heads and ten horns, falls to the level of the monstrous and grotesque.

On the other hand, where, unless it be in the pages of the older Hebrew prophets, shall we match the grandeur and impressiveness of many of the vivid word-pictures which this book presents? Take, for example, the going forth of the four horses, as the first four seals are broken, in their startling contrast of colors and riders—from the splendid and spotless charger of the great warrior who goes forth "conquering and to conquer," to the ghastly creature of corpse-like hue bestrode by the grim form of death; the chosen champions of heaven, as it were, entering the lists and taking their place to play their awful part in the coming tournament of God. What a terrific scene, again, is that presented to us under the sixth seal, when, as amid the convulsive throes of expiring nature, the sun becomes black as sackcloth of hair, the moon becomes as blood, and the stars are rained down to the earth, like the unripe fruit of the fig-tree shaken by a mighty wind, while the very heavens are rent asunder like a burning scroll, and every mountain and island is moved out of its place! Again, what a startling image is that, under the second trumpet, of a vast volcanic mass, ablaze with fire, plunged into the sea, causing the deep to "boil like a pot," and sending up great clouds of vapor, which, as they are borne away by the fainting breeze, disclose the appalling spectacle of a sea of blood, upon whose surface float in vast masses the lifeless forms of its finny inhabitants, and the more terrible wreckage of many a gallant ship.

Of a very different character, but not less impressive, is the figure which we meet with, under the fourth trumpet, of "a mighty eagle" flying in the mid-heaven, between the earth darkened by the shadow of still on-coming judgments, and a heaven silent with anticipative awe, crying out with a loud voice, "Woe, woe, woe, to the inhabiters of the earth." Coming as it does immediately after the tremendous phenomena of the previous trumpets, there is something peculiarly impressive in the austere solemnity of this figure. We mark the stately progress of the king of birds, and, as Solomon tells us, there is something "wonderful" in "the way of an eagle in the air," we seem to hear the beat of its might pinions and the picture once realized, lives in the memory forever. To have seen an angel in mid-heaven announcing coming judgment would have been solemn; but, to us at least, the cry of that solitary eagle seems more solemn yet.

THE WORLD FOR CHRIST.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing June 23. Acts 1: 1-18.

NOWHERE is monopoly more out of place than in religion. The Church has, however, been very slow to realize the fact. At the very outset there was manifest reluctance to admit the non-Jewish world to fellowship. It required a supernatural vision to convince Peter that the Gospel was for Gentiles as well as for Jews; and many of his associates, to the last, placed difficulties in the way of missionary work. If they could have had their way, they would have made Christianity a Jewish sect. The same disposition has appeared with greater or less prominence at intervals all through the history of the Church. There have always been men who gloried in being "a little flock," "a peculiar people," and were disposed to shut the door and not let too many people come in. Every creed in Christendom has been framed with the object of excluding some from the church, by setting up a standard of belief which should operate as a Shibboleth of orthodoxy. But the new wine has been always bursting the old bottles, and men have become less and less patient with creeds and restrictions. As the centuries have passed, and the knowledge of Christ has grown with the quickened perception of education and closer international communication, the idea of the Church has broadened and the sense of interdenominational brotherhood has strengthened. The man who enjoys worship with a liturgy finds that the man who prefers extempore prayer and freedom from form, may be just as sincere a Christian as himself. The man who has been baptized by immersion sees that the man who was sprinkled in his infancy and is satisfied with that, is loving and serving Christ as earnestly as himself. A sense of union has developed which is real in spite of surface distinctions. From this has grown a longing for aggressive effort. The idea of the Christian as one who is loyal to Christ, by whatever name he may call himself, has led to an increased desire to extend Christ's kingdom. The spirit of Christ, which was essentially the spirit of unselfishness and of love, has moved in the church, filling his people with the desire that others may enjoy the blessings that have transformed their own lives. The great Missionary Societies preaching Christ to the heathen abroad; the Salvation Army preaching him to the heathen at home; and the Sunday Schools and young people's societies preaching him to the rising generation, are all developments of the true spirit of Christianity which is not so eager to make proselytes as to bring men in contact with Christ. He gives life still and he gives it without restrictions as to race or nationality or condition. The same Gospel has the same effect if preached to the Hindoo or the Esquimaux, the African or the Chinaman. Its power is as great now as at the first, and wherever it is declared and men look to Christ, they cease to be mere animals; they become men and expect the time when they will be declared sons of God.

A KING'S DAUGHTER'S CHURCH.

The Canadian Secretary of the King's Daughters sends to the "Silver Cross" an interesting account of the dedication of a new church in Manitoba, which has grown out of the effort of one member of the Order to serve the Master. She was living in a farming district in which there were no religious services nor any religious meetings of any kind. Her own spiritual isolation she felt to be most depressing, but her heart went out to others who had not the spiritual resources that she had. She persuaded a few little girls who spent the Sunday in play, to meet her in the afternoon for a Bible talk. The number grew, and she soon had more children in her class than her home could accommodate. Some of their parents, too, wanted to come. The time to build a little school building had evidently come. Interest was made with the government and a grant of a small plot of land was obtained. The men of the district offered to give their labor in building free, and nothing remained to be done but to raise the money for materials. A few members of a Christian Endeavor Society heard of the work and undertook to raise twenty dollars. With this sum sufficient timber was purchased, and the men kept their promise of giving their labor. The church is completed and has been dedicated free of debt. Dr. Bryce, of Winnipeg, officiated at the dedication ceremonies and the church is now in regular working order. So much has come through the unostentatious work of one lady who realized the obligations of the service she entered in assuming the little silver cross.

A GRAND Y. M. C. A. WORK.

Probably few people in the East have any idea of the extent of a work which has been undertaken by the Young Men's Christian Associations of Wisconsin. It is an effort to carry on evangelistic work in that State. Mr. Alfred Terry, the Secretary of the Association at Chippewa Falls, who has charge of this undertaking writes us a thrilling description of the necessity for the effort and the means adopted to meet it. He says that "in Wisconsin alone there are during the winter at least twelve hundred lumber camps in which not less than fifty thousand men are employed."

HAULING LOGS TO THE RIVER.

The woodsmen are usually engaged in November or early in December and are in the camp until late in the spring. They are generally accommodated in huts built of untrimmed logs, one large room serving as sitting-room, smoking-room and sleeping-room for fifty or sixty men. Connected with this camp is the kitchen and dining-room where they are fed when it happens that their work does not lie too far away for them to reach it for their mid-day meal. The cook, usually a bright, intelligent man, steps to the door of the dining-room and blows a horn as the signal that dinner is on the table. The men away in the forest throw down their axes as the welcome sound reaches their ears, and hurry to the camp. About fifteen minutes suffices to satisfy appetites sharpened by the cold, clear air and hard work, and then they hasten back to toil until sunset. When they are at work at a place too far away for that method, the cook puts his provisions in a wagon and drives to the scene of operations. There the men gather around a great log fire and eat their meal in the woods. Time is precious in the short winter days and the minutes saved in going to and fro are considered well saved.

After the work of hewing is finished for the season there is a brief interval, and then the drive commences. The logs are piled in the bed of the stream and when the flood commences they float down followed by the men in boats. This is the most dangerous part of the business; for when a jam occurs, the men climb to the top of the pile and roll the logs down one at a time until the jam is relieved. Many a brave man has been crushed or drowned in this critical operation. Nor is the work of hewing down the trees free from peril. It is no uncommon experience to see the wagon coming at full speed from the camp to the city with no load on it but a small heap covered with blankets. It drives to a hospital, the blankets are removed and underneath is the mangled form of a man, too often beyond the help the surgeons can give before the hospital gate is reached. The most experienced woodsmen are often mistaken as to the moment or direction in which a tree will fall and are liable to be caught under it.

The most serious feature of the logging-camp to the Christian mind is the scene in the common room at night after the day's work is done. The men who see neither woman nor child for six months of the year show the natural result of being withdrawn from refining and domestic influences. Too often they become coarse and degraded in speech and manner, and their talk and their songs are of the foulest type. The purveyors of vile literature, too, take advantage of their isolation to market their pernicious wares and thus add fuel to the flame.

Very little was done by organized effort to reach this enormous number of men in their isolation until the Young Men's Christian Association took up the work. Mr. Terry purchased a horse and cutter on his own responsibility and loading it with pure literature drove from camp to camp, distributing it and holding Gospel services. The visits were so cordially welcomed and there were so many tokens of blessing that a year a better sleigh was bought and two men were kept on circuit all the winter. The sleigh is covered, so that in the wi nights, when the thermometer is thirty forty degrees below zero, they could in it when, as frequently happens, th no possibility of accommodating the the logging camp. In the sleigh there good reed organ for use in the ser The value of this addition to the equip was speedily proved. The men charmed and delighted with the musi singing and joined with not unm voices in the choruses. The services then doubly welcome and were ea anticipated. The change in the top the songs at night after the visito gone to the next camp is very notic and in more than one camp there hav hopeful cases of conversion. We are to learn that Mr. Terry is in difficulty the cost of his equipment. He is de about fifty dollars, and unless he c tain it, he is liable to lose his orga cutter, and so be unable to resume his next season. If any of our readers like to aid him in the emergency we be happy to receive their gifts and w ward them to him, duly acknowl them in this journal.

A Moslem Pilgrimage.

A Fanatical Host gathered at Mecca—Strange Ceremonials to be Observed—Many Women among the Pilgrims.

DURING the present month, Mecca, in Arabia, the birth-place of the founder of the Mohammedan faith, will be a scene of unusual activity. It is the season of the sacred annual pilgrimage and there are already over 100,000 Moslems gathered in the sacred city from all Asia, parts of Africa and southeastern Europe. Russia, China, Persia, India, Syria, Greece, Egypt, the Sultan's dominions and the isles of the sea all furnish their quota to swell the throng that crowds its central and absorbing point of interest, Mecca. It would be difficult to describe adequately the hardships and dangers that accompany such a pilgrimage. As the great majority of devotees are extremely poor they suffer dreadfully in the long and toilsome journey. Men and women come from thousands of miles, by whatever conveyances they may and it is not at all surprising that multitudes perish in their such ventures.

Among the wealthier pilgrims are numbers of women who make the hadj" (pilgrimage, showy pageants who ride along the highways of Arabia the desert in gilded palanquins on the backs of well-fed camels. These Oriental dames, richly dressed and bejewelled, and with all save their eyes hidden from vulgar gaze, know little and care less about the miseries the poorer pilgrims endure. Travelers describe their gay, embroidered pavilions of linen, spread on the plain at the foot of Mount Arafat near Mecca, as being like the handsome tents at a princely festival. Some haughty Asiatic princesses come to Mecca with a train of a hundred grooms and a small army of black slaves. Like frivolous, fashionable people in other parts of the world, their worship of Allah and his prophet is simply an opportunity for display of pomp and finery; but their "Ain," (the equivalent, presumably, of our "Amen,") uttered at the close of their frequent devotions is as loud and fervent, apparently, as that of the most venerable pilgrim present.

On reaching the last stage of the outward journey, the pilgrim discards his ordinary garments and assumes the "ihram," or pilgrim's dress. It usually consists of two plain widths of coarse cloth, one with a fringe, being thrown over the left shoulder and caught under the right arm and the other bound around the loins. Each group of pilgrims shown in the picture is a "cat-father," who has as his special charge a number of felines—the cat being held in reverence by the followers of the Prophet. The camels on which the pilgrims are mounted are gayly caparisoned and wear curious-looking knee-plates of leather studded with pieces of glass that can be seen flashing in the sun, while the beasts are yet a considerable distance off.

Even when the pilgrim has reached Mecca, his task is by no means over. He has to perform many absurd rites and ceremonies. Among other things, he is expected to circle the temple of the Prophet seven times, first slowly, then at a lively walk and lastly at a brisk run. He must kiss the famous black stone on the corner of the temple each time on his return to that point. He must recite prayers incessantly. He must also climb the so-called sacred hill of Arafat seven times. These acts he must faithfully perform if he would secure the remission of past sins and a certain measure of spiritual indulgence for the future.

The "Black Stone," is a boulder, presumably an ærolite, which is set in one corner of the Kaaba. This stone, which has been pressed by the lips of millions, is declared by the priests to have been originally "one of the precious stones of Paradise," which the angel Gabriel brought to Mecca.

A correspondent writing from Rome, describes a visit to the Vatican, and mentions the magnificent furnishings of the Pope's carriage-houses. There are a great many carriages, although the present pontiff uses only two. The State carriage is gold upholstered in crimson velvet, with four folding steps of the same color. The harness of this carriage is valued at $12,000. In the same city are hundreds so poor that they have not a coin or a single possession of value in the world. The assumption of pomp and the vain parade of riches by the church is diametrically opposed to the true spirit of Christianity. It is related of Luther that on one occasion he received as a gift from some warm-hearted and generous admirer a set of statuettes of the twelve apostles, in silver. They were laid aside and almost forgotten. One day a friend came to him and wanted money for a worthy object. Luther had none at the moment, but on searching about his room, came upon the statuettes. His eye lighted up. "Ah," said he, addressing the twelve, "you are lying idle here, when you should be about your Master's business. Here," turning to his visitor, "take these and have them melted into coin, and apply the proceeds to the worthy work you desire to forward." So those who are in Christ will unhesitatingly deny themselves the indulgence of everything that tends to vanity and worldly show in order that "the Master's business" may go forward. Such an example in high places cannot fail to influence many others.

An Invalid's Garden.

Flowers cheer the sick-room wonderfully. A tiny garden can be made to stand on a table by the bedside of an invalid by cutting a piece of sheet wadding to fit the top of a large bowl or wide-mouthed jar, which is filled with water just high enough for the bottom of the wadding to touch it. Two or three small pieces of charcoal in the bottom of the bowl will keep the water pure. When all is arranged the top of the wadding should be sprinkled with the seeds of mignonette, sweet alyssum or any other easily grown annual. The roots pierce down through the wadding and are nourished by the water, while leaves and blossoms in a reasonable time conceal the top; and many dainty water-loving plants of trailing habit, with glossy foliage, may be stuck in the wadding so that the lower joint of the stem will touch the water; in a short time roots will be sent out from this joint, and the vine will begin to grow and trail over the side of the table.

Praying Mothers.

One of the sweetest recollections a person can enjoy in this world is that which brings back the memory of a praying mother. Richard Knill, a missionary in Russia, on returning to England, home to his native village, slept in the chamber where he had slept when a boy. All night long he lay awake thinking of the mercies and goodness of God to him through life. Early in the morning he looked out of the window, and saw a tree in the garden beneath which his mother had prayed with him forty years before. He went out, and on the same spot knelt down and thanked God for a praying mother. What blessings come through mothers who train their children in the ways of prayer and peace.

Oh, happy house, where, with the hands of prayer,
Parents commit their children to the Friend
Who, with a more than mother's tender care,
Will watch and keep them safely to the end.

ANOTHER WORD FOR THE BIRDS.

FROM many different quarters, letters have come to us heartily approving THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S utterances on the slaughtering of the song-birds as sacrifices at the shrine of fashion. An interesting plea is also made by H. Nehrling in the "Mayflower. He writes: "The greatest enemies of our birds are the millliners, the wholesale dealers in dead birds, and those who buy from them. To sacrifice the birds to fashion, for hat ornamentation and personal decoration, is the most heartless and the least defensible of all sins against Nature. Of over 60,000,000 inhabitants, half may be said to belong to the dead-bird wearing class—of whom at least 10,000,000 persons are of the bird-wearing age and proclivities. Some are content with a single bird, if a large one, mounted nearly entire; others prefer several small ones—a group of three or four to half a dozen; or the heads and wings of even a greater number. Others, still, will content themselves with a few wings fancifully dyed and bespangled, or a wreath of Grebe 'fur,' usually dyed, and not infrequently set off with Egret-plumes. In the average, however, there must be an incongruous assemblage made up of parts of various birds, or several entire, representing at least a number of individuals.

"But let us say, to illustrate, that these ten million bird-wearers have but a single bird each, that these birds may be "made over" so as to do service for more than a single season; and still what an annual sacrifice of bird-life is entailed! Can it be placed at less than 5,000,000?—ten times more than the number of specimens extant in all our scientific collections, private and public together, and probably a thousand times greater than the annual destruction of birds for scientific purposes. Many of our bright-colored birds are annually killed and exported to Europe in incalculable numbers. These are mostly warblers, scarlet tanagers, hummingbirds, Baltimore orioles, indigo-birds, nonpareils, cardinal redbirds and many more. It is no longer surprising that many species and even genera, of birds are fast disappearing. It has been suggested that the Christian women of this country throw their influence against the barbarous custom of using birds for personal decoration. Parents and guardians, schools and churches can do much in this direction. It is the duty of every teacher in this great country to educate and influence his pupils to protect the birds."

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER XXV.

Fred's Story.

NERVOUSLY glancing at Alice, as if uncertain of her capacity to bear a sudden disclosure, Fred began his story, while Alice and Mrs. Callaghan listened intently. The good Irish woman was proud of her position as hostess, and had evidently conceived a favorable opinion of Fred. Not many young men would, in her opinion, have been good enough to be a husband for her favorite; but Fred was approved of at once, and she felt flattered by his wishing her to be present at the conference.

"You know, I dare say, Mrs. Callaghan," Fred said, "that this young lady had a brother Will, of whom she was very fond."

"I've heard her speak of him time and again, sir, and sorry I was to hear that he was dead. Bedad, she needed a man to stand by her in all she's had to go through, and I wished many's the time she had father or brother or husband to protect her. It's glad I am that as she can't have the first nor the second, that some one has come that's fit to be the third."

"Thank you for your good opinion, Mrs. Callaghan. I shall try to deserve it. I've just come from the place where this young man was. I went to see if I could collect some connected account of the sad affair, and see if he left any things that his mother and sister ought to have. While I was there I made a surprising discovery, and it is that I want to talk to Miss Alice about. It will astonish her, as it did me, and I thought as the walls of your house are not very thick, it would be a good thing to tell the story somewhere out of ear-shot of Mrs. Mapleton."

"Don't keep me in suspense, Fred," Alice said; "let me know all you learned about Will. However horrible it may be, I am strong enough to bear it."

"I hope so. Well, I went first of all to Will's boarding-place. The people who keep it are very good, and the woman at the head of it was very kind to Will. She willingly told me all she knew about the fatality, which it was easy to see had painfully affected her. She said she had sent everything belonging to Will to you in his trunk. Then I got a horse and rode out to the scene of the catastrophe. I wanted to get a sketch of the grave, that you might have an idea of the place. I found it easily, and then I scoured the country round to see if there was any one who had seen the fight, or who had buried the dead. I could not find any one for a long time, but at last a man told me that in the next village there was a man who had been in the struggle, and would know all about it; but the man was sick, with a wound, he thought, and might not be able to talk. Of course I went at once to hunt up the man. On my way I overtook a woman who knew him. She told me that the man had been wounded in the fight, and had wandered over the mountain; he had been shot in the arm and wounded in the head, and had been crazy ever since; that a good woman had taken him in, and had done verything she could for him, but no one knew who he was, and that he was very bad and delirious."

Alice sat with her elbows on the table and her face between her hands; her eyes fixed on Fred's face. "Oh, be quick, tell me about him," was all she said as Fred paused.

"Well," continued Fred, "I found the cottage, and when I entered I saw the man lying on a mattrass, which was on the floor. His head was bound up with a red handkerchief, and his face was ghastly pale; he was unconscious, but alive, and in a moment I was on my knees beside him, for it was—"

"Not Will?" cried Alice, whose face was pale as death, and whose eyes seemed almost starting from their sockets.

"Yes, Alice, dear, it was Will, your brother."

Alice dropped her head upon the table and a sob shook her whole body.

"The saints be praised!" said Mrs. Callaghan, who had taken as much interest in the story as Alice.

"Please-go-on," said Alice, as soon as she could speak.

"Well," continued Fred, "I sent a messenger with a note to the surgeon at the mines, and remained to do what I could for your brother. The messenger lost no time in finding the doctor, and as Will was so much beloved at the mines, the doctor rode all night to reach us as soon as possible. He found a pistol ball imbedded in his skull, which he removed, and in a short time we were delighted to see Will open his eyes and hear him call us by name. It was a week before we could remove him to the mines, where the enthusiastic miners almost caused a relapse by their great rejoicing. Of course he was eager to relieve your minds, but you know we could not find you by letter or telegram, so we determined to start for home immediately, but the journey was almost too much for him."

"Then my brother is alive, and in the city!" cried Alice, as she sprang to her feet and passed her hand over her brow as if bewildered. "I must go to him, where is he?"

"Now, you mustn't get excited, my dear young lady," said Mrs. Callaghan, down whose honest red face the tears were running. "Shure, I'm as glad as if it was my own boy who'd come back to life again." And she caught Alice in her arms.

"Thank you, you dear good soul," said Alice as she threw her arms around the woman's neck and kissed her, "thank you for bringing me to myself again; but I am so happy, that I am afraid of waking up and finding it is all a dream."

"You said in the church that if I could have brought Will back with me, that this would be the happiest time of your life," said Fred, "and I came near telling you then, but even good news, when it is as agitating as this, ought to be broken gently. Then, too, I had to think of Will who is far from strong yet. I knew you would want to go to him and I had left him fast asleep, so I thought it would be better for him to remain undisturbed until the morning. It did seem cruel to withhold the good news from your mother, only I thought it would do her more harm than good, as she could not see him until to-morrow, and that is why I have acted so strangely to-night."

"Shure, sur, you couldn't have shown better sinse if you had been a praste," said Mrs. Callaghan.

"You are as wise as you are good, Fred," said Alice. "How much I owe you! Poor Will might have died, as we thought he had, but for you. I never dreamed of such joy as this. To have you back was almost more than I dared to hope for, but to think of your bringing Will with you! It is like life from the dead. Oh, I can never repay you."

"I think you can. You are going to give me yourself and I should like to know how much you are worth. Young men don't often win a prize like that. And as for Will, he is worth saving on his own account. You will scarcely know him, he has become such a fine, manly fellow. When he gets over this sickness he will be a regular athlete."

"How can I wait until morning without seeing him, and without telling mother? I shall not sleep until I have seen him, indeed I shall not go to bed," said Alice.

"And it's not a wink I'll be taking myself," said Mrs. Callaghan, "so you see how it would be wid your mother if she was to know."

"Oh, and how happy dear Louie will be when she knows," said Alice.

"By the by, who is this Louie that Will talks about?" asked Fred.

"He will tell you," said Alice, "she is one of the dearest friends I have."

"Now I must go. Shall we meet here, or shall I come for you and your mother, and drive to the hotel in the morning?"

"Oh, I don't know; which will be best, Mrs. Callaghan?" asked Alice.

"Shure I'm not the one to spake fur a lady loike your mother, but if it was one of my own people that was asking me I'd say bring the boy home to his mother, if he is able to come, and if it's not such a home as the grand one he left, still it will be coming home to mother and sister," said Mrs. Callaghan.

"You are right, Mrs. Callaghan," said Fred, "although I was going to counsel the opposite, 'Be it ever so humble there's no place like home,' and there is where the sick and tired wanderers always want to go, to home and mother. It is because you are a mother that Miss Alice referred the question to you, and it was the mother-love that spoke before the mind had time to reason out the matter; thank God, mother's love is not confined to any one class, but is the same all over the world, and has been ever since Eve wept over Abel, and I have no doubt tried to shield Cain."

Fred was a long time saying "good night" to Alice, but he went at last, and Alice returned to Mrs. Callaghan.

"Now," said the good woman, "I've been thinking what we'll do; "we'll just fix up this room for your brother. You see it's not much use I make of it anyway, and its right across the hall. We can put two beds in it, if the two gentlemen wish to be together."

"Why that would be delightful, if you could rent us this room for a few days, until we can make other arrangments."

"Ugh! now, Miss, don't be talking about renting: shure there isn't a Callaghan but will be as proud as if a prince was using the room."

"I will go out, and order the beds and things early in the morning," said Alice.

"And I will fix the room up as soon as the things come," said Mrs. Callaghan.

"Now," said Alice, as she kissed the good woman good night, "you go to bed, and I will go to our room and sit by the fire and think awhile."

"I will if you'll promise to do the same yourself," said Mrs. Callaghan; "you know you'll want to look your purtiest in the morning, so take a good sleep—its the most sensible thing to do."

"Perhaps I will," said Alice, "good night."

CHAPTER XXVI.

The Fatted Calf.

The next morning, as Alice was hurrying about, her mother came out of her room. "Why are you up so early, and what are you bustling about so for?" asked Mrs. Mapleton.

"Why, mamma, it is nearly eight o'clock and I have been out for a walk already; besides I want to make our room look as pretty as possible, as I expect visitors at ten."

"Oh yes, Mr. Morgan, I suppose."

"Yes," said Alice, "and a dear friend of his and ours."

"But, my child, why are you so excited? I never saw you act so before."

"Now, dear mamma, sit down in this easy chair, and I will tell you some good news, the best you ever heard, if you will promise to keep as cool as you can."

"I will, my child. Is it about our property?"

"A million times better than that," said Alice, as she dropped on her knees by her mother's side.

"Why, my dear child, I think it is I who should ask you to keep cool, you must be going out of your mind; what can it possibly be?"

And there was a startled look on Mrs. Mapleton's face.

"It is about dear brother Will," said Alice."

"You said it was good news, Alice, and how can good news come from that lonely grave?" asked Mrs. Mapleton.

"No, mamma, but Will was not killed outright in the fight; he was desperately wounded, and Fred found him and nursed him back to life."

"To life!" cried Mrs. Mapleton, as she caught both of Alice's hands in hers with a vice-like grip. "And does he still live?—speak quickly," and she tried to rise: but Alice gently but firmly held her in the chair.

"Now mamma, you must not get excited: yes, he still lives, but is very weak."

Mrs. Mapleton burst into tears. "Go on, Alice, tell me all. I am very cool and will not get excited," she sobbed.

"Well," continued Alice, "Fred will bring him here this morning. He was not last night, as he did not think it safe for you or Will to meet until he had prepared the way, and that was why he would not agitate you by telling you the good news until he could bring him to you or you could go to him."

"Can it possibly be true, can such happiness be in store for me? Oh! first let me thank the dear Lord who permits me to say, This my son was dead and is alive again."

And she kneeled down and offered such an audible prayer, as could only come from the lips of a loving, Christian mother, whose heart was full to overflowing with joy and gratitude.

Mrs. Callaghan, whose knock had not been heard, had stepped into the room and she stood with bowed head, and tears running down her cheeks, until the prayer was finished.

"You have heard the good news, too," Mrs Mapleton, as she saw the Irish woman.

"I have, mum, and my heart is just breaking with happiness because of it." The two women were locked in each other's arms—a refined, educated lady, and the honest, hard-working woman—a child of mother's love, showing that like the love of God, it is not a respecter of persons, caste or laws of etiquette, but like the air we breathe, is the same in rich and poor, ignorant and learned, the world over.

Mrs. Callaghan had been up since daylight preparing the room for the young gentlemen: as early as six o'clock she had gone with Alice to arouse the proprietor of a furniture establishment, who lived over his store on the next block, and had ordered such things as they needed for the room. Alice had also furnished Mrs. Callaghan with money to get such other things as she might think necessary. By seven Mrs. Callaghan, who had worked nearly all night, was aroused to help put up the beds and lend such other help as was necessary. "Don't be cross now, and ye shall sleep the whole blessed day tomorrow," said the good wife.

Alice was not allowed to see the room until it was finished, and Mrs. Callaghan had come to tell her her that it was ready. Alice explained to her mother the arrangements they had made so that the could keep Will when he came.

Mrs. Mapleton was delighted. "But how did you come to think of such a plan, my dear?"

"I didn't," said Alice; "it was Mrs. Callaghan who suggested it."

"You are a dear, good, woman," said Mrs. Mapleton, "and you must be thinking for me for a day or two, I am helpless; all I can rhink of is that Will is alive and is coming home."

"Yes, mum, but you must take a cup of tea and eat some breakfast, to be strong and look well at the meeting," said the good woman left, and in a minute came with a tray on which was a nice breakfast for Mrs. Mapleton.

"Why, you good, thoughtful soul," said Alice, "I had forgotten all about breakfast myself."

"I thought you would, miss, for I knew you'd be so agitated loike, that you'd spoil it in the cooking. It isn't much I have been after bringing, only a pot o' tay, bit of toast and some boiled eggs."

"Yes, sit down, Mamma," said Alice, "and eat some breakfast."

"Yes dear, I will—what time is it? Half past eight! and they are not to be here until ten. How long the time seems."

"Yes, mum, it always seems a long time when we are waiting for something good, a holiday seems to come slow, but it always comes before you expect it."

After breakfast Mrs. Callaghan asked them to look into the room she had prepared. Alice just clapped her hands in delight as soon as the door was opened.

"How have you done it in so short time?" and she fairly danced about the room while asking questions. Mrs. Mapleton was equally pleased. "You have very good taste, indeed," she said, "for seldom have I seen a prettier room."

And it was pretty; the two beds were cheap, but new and bright, and their snowy counterpaoes, and the lace on each pillow-case, gave the air of refinement. The little grate had been polished, and a bright coal fire in it brightened up the whole room; the white lawn curtains were drawn across the windows and the room looked sweet and home-like.

TO summon from the past and reproduce with any detail the story of Israel's life in the desert is now impossible. The outlines alone remain, severe, careless of almost everything that does not bear on religion. Neither from Exodus nor from Numbers can we gather those touches that would enable us to reconstruct the incidents of a single day as it passed in the camp or on the march. The tribes move from one wilderness" to another. The hardship of the life of wandering appears unrelieved, throughout the history the doings of God not the achievements or sufferings of the people, are the great theme. The plot of the Book of Numbers is of a kind that reminds us continually of the prophets. Resentment against the distrustful and rebellious, like that which Amos, Hosea and Jeremiah express, is felt in almost every portion of the narrative. At the same time the difference between Numbers and the books of the prophets is wide and striking. Here the style is simple, often even with little emotion, scarcely any rhetoric. The legislative purpose reacts on the story, and makes the spirit of the book severe. Seldom does the writer allow himself to depite from the grave task of presenting Israel's duties and delinquencies, and all to the majesty of God. We are made partially to feel the burden with which the leaders of the people are charged; and if the book is no poem: to excite sympathy and lead up to a great climax does not come within the design.

The problem which appears again and again in Moses' relation with the people is still the theocratic idea as against the passing at immediate success. At various points from the start in Egypt onwards, the opportunity of assuming a regal position comes to Moses. He is virtually dictator and he might be king. But a rare singleness of mind keeps him true to Jehovah's lordship, which he endeavors to impress on the conscience of the people and the course of their development. He has even to do so at the greatest risk to himself. He holds back the people in what seems the hour of advance, and it is the will of Jehovah by which they are detained. The Unseen King is their Helper and Lord their Rhadamanthine Judge; and Moses falls the burden of forcing that truth on their minds.

Israel could never, according to Moses' idea, come a great people in the sense in which the nations of the world were great. Its worst them greatness was sought in spite of morality, in defiance of all that Jehovah commanded. Israel might never forget in wealth, territory, influence, but it was to be true. She existed for Jehovah, while the gods of other nations existed for them, had no part to play without them. Jehovah was not to be overborne by Israel's will or the needs of his people. Only the self-existent Lord. The name and the represent a supernatural assistance which could be secured on terms, or by any devoted person. Moses himself, though elevated Jehovah, did not change him. Jehovah's desire was sometimes thwarted; Moses had often to give the oracle with sorrow and disappointment.

CATHOLIC ENTERPRISE.†

AFTER King Henry VIII. was excommunicated, and Ireland rebelled, and England itself threatened disturbance, the king had to look to his security. He made little noise about it. But the Spanish ambassador reported him as silently building ships in the Thames and at Portsmouth. As invasion seemed imminent, he began with sweeping the seas of the looser craft. A few swift, well-armed cruisers suddenly out of the Solent, caught and destroyed a pirate fleet in Mount's Bay, and sent to the bottom some Flemish privateers in the Downs, and captured the Flemish Admiral himself. Danger at home growing more menacing, and the monks spreading the fire which grew into the pilgrimage of Grace, Henry suppressed the abbeys, sold the lands, and with the proceeds armed the coasts with fortresses. "You threaten me," he seemed to say to them, "that you will use the wealth our fathers gave you to overthrow my government and bring in the invader. I will take your wealth and use it to disappoint your treachery." You may see the remnant of Henry's work in the fortresses anywhere along the English coast from Berwick to the Land's End.

Louder thundered the Vatican. In 1539 Henry's time appeared to have come. France and Spain made peace, and the pope's sentence was now expected to be executed by Charles or Francis or both. A crowd of vessels large and small was collected in the Scheldt, for what purpose save to transport an army into England? Scotland had joined the Catholic League. Henry fearlessly appealed to the English people. Catholic peers and priests might conspire against him, but explain it how we will, the nation was loyal to Henry and came to his side. The London merchants armed their ships in the river. From the seaports everywhere came armed brigantines and sloops. The fishermen of the West left their boats and nets to their wives, and the fishing was none the worse, for the women handled oar and sail and line and went to the whiting grounds, while their husbands had gone to fight for their king. Genius kindled into discovery at the call of the country. Mr. Fletcher of Rye invented a boat the like of which was never seen before, which would work to windward, with sails trimmed fore and aft, the greatest revolution yet made in shipbuilding. A hundred and fifty sail collected at Sandwich to match the armament in the Scheldt; and Marillac, the French ambassador reported with amazement the energy of king and people. The Catholic powers thought better of it. This was not the England that Cardinal Pole had told them was longing for their appearance. The Scheldt force dispersed. . . . Charles V. returned to wiser counsels and made an alliance with Henry instead of invading his dominions.

CHRISTIAN YOUNG MEN OF INDIA.

A worker in the Young Men's Christian Association of Calcutta, writes: The work here is in splendid condition. It has the cooperation and sympathy of all the Protestant ministers and missionaries in the city. The business men are coming grandly forward in the matter of finance, and now, as a result of the McNeill Mission, there have been about five thousand dollars pledged towards a building, and this without any systematic canvass.

It's a slow process, usually—education, development, and growth. But it hasn't been so with Pearline. Pearline's success has been a wonder, from the start. All the more so when you consider the many poor imitations of it, which claim to make washing easy. These things tend to confuse people, of course. They're forced on the public by peddlers, prizes, substitution, etc. No doubt they're often thought to be the same as Pearline. We protest. Don't judge Pearline by the company it has to keep. 471

"I HAVE CALLED YOU FRIENDS."

O H! word of meaning holy,
My raptured ear attends!
For hearts bereft and lowly,
"Lo! I have called you friends!"

Thou in whose wondrous being,
The God with manhood blends,
All knowing, and all seeing,
Even thou hast called us friends!

Borne down with human weakness,
And sense of sinful ways,
Our hearts would fain with meekness
Accept the servants' place.

But while that pity seeking,
Which thy compassion lends,
We hear thee gently speaking,
"Lo! I have called you friends!"

Oh! joy of walk in union!
Till life's rough journey ends;
Oh! wonderful communion!
That thou should call us friends!

NIAGARA ONCE RAN DRY.

Comparatively few Americans are aware that the great cataract of Niagara once ran dry, yet such is the fact. Hon. Mr. Lockwood, of Buffalo, recalls the occurrence in a published letter. He writes that it happened on March 29, 1848, and for several hours the wonderful torrent did cease to flow, and the river ran dry. The preceding winter had been a severe one, and the ice which had formed in Lake Erie was of phenomenal thickness. There came on March 27 a sudden and exceedingly warm spell of weather, which melted the snows, and then a warm rain poured down in torrents during the entire day of the 28th of march. The ice was loosened and a strong east wind drove it far out in the lake during the night. But at sunrise on the 29th the wind came from the west, and, as the sailors say, it was "blowing great guns." This terrific gale drove the immense mass of ice into the mouth of the Niagara river, where it was gorged and piled up from shore to shore, hermetically sealing the river and damming the waters back into the lake. Thus it happened that Niagara river ran dry, its falls became bleak, barren rocks, and its mighty thunders were put to sleep. Within four or five hours tiny streams of water began to trickle through the gorge. The tremendous power back of those streams accelerated their flowing, and in a short time the ice dam gave way, and there never was such a wild, roaring, mad flood in Niagara before or since; and thus the cataract became itself again.

'he Children are His Flock.

Or Sunday School Missionary's latest Jbors—Many new Schools Founded.

DURING these early summer weeks, Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, our energetic Sunday School missionary in the Southwest, has not been idle. That this is the case is shown by a letter just recved from Mr. Sharp, in which he gis us this cheering record:

'The day after I sent you my letter in Ap, I drove till late in the evening to rea the neighborhood where I was to be the ext day (Sunday), when I preached to a ge audience in the morning; after whh I drove several miles through rain an mud to reach an appointment to organize school at Perche. The superintendent no reports four teachers and forty scholars nd says: 'The prospect is good for a live school.'

'I reached my next appointment by a hat drive, again through a rain and over muly roads, but arrived in time to address the eople and organize St. Clair School, fro which, after the following Sunday, I rec ved the following report: 'Four teachers nd forty-seven scholars. We had a fine attendance, and all seemed to take an intest.' The night following, I planted a schl at the Naylor school-house, which has eported an attendance on a Sunday of fou eachers and twenty-seven scholars.

'Ebree is the name of a school I organized in a small village in an unoccupied storoom. A report from the Superintendent shows: 'Four teachers and thirty-five schlars.'

'The population of my field, (north Missou, estimated from the last census, and the obable increase since, must be a million f souls. It is a beautiful and fertile country. It is my earnest desire and prayer that may be used by Him in the conversion and salvation of sinners. I ask the prars of the children of God who may reachese lines." GEO. W. SHARP,

Christian Herald Missionary of Am. S. S. Union.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON

QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In COMPOUNDING, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

—Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.—

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. ☞Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) VOLUME 18. COPYRIGHT 1895, BY LOUIS KLOPSCH. NUMBER 25.

REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D., Editor. Offices, Bible House, New York. NEW YORK, JUNE 19, 1895. PRICE, 5 CENTS. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

Forty Thousand Children Rescued!

The Grand Industrial and Reformatory Work of the Five Points House of Industry, Which is Now to be Demolished—How Rev. Lewis M. Pease, its Founder, Labored for Souls—A Shining Record of Christian Work in New York City.

IN these days of widespread Christian activity, when a very large proportion of the thoughtful and serious-minded men and women of civilized nations are striving to elevate the millions of ignorant and vicious in the lower strata of society, there are few pages of unselfish, devoted Christian effort that furnish stronger encouragement to the reader than that given below. Forty-five years ago, the "Five Points" was the most notorious and crime-infested locality in New York. In 1850, a number of members of the Ladies' Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who were interested in aiding the destitute poor, met for consultation as to the best methods of doing missionary work on a more extended scale than they had hitherto attempted. One of them suggested the opening of a mission at the Five Points. From this modest beginning sprang the Five Points Mission, known under the name as a substantial and far-reaching agency for the reformation of the sinful and vicious classes. In the same year, and under similar auspices, was begun another glorious work in the neighborhood, the Five Points House of Industry," which was destined in after years to be recognized as an example of heroic achievement rarely paralleled in the history of American philanthropy. It was largely owing to the combined efforts that the Five Points from being a pandemonium and Chinese synonym of all that was depraved and abominable, became a quiet, wholesome, law-abiding neighborhood, and a centre of Christian activity from which helpful influences went out in every direction. The main building of the House of Industry has lately been doomed to demolition, one of the walls having been condemned as unsafe. It will shortly be replaced by a much larger building capable of accommodating five hundred children.

In the opinion of good people in those early days, never was there a more unpromising enterprise of Christian benevolence than that which Rev. Lewis M. Pease entered upon when, in the spring of 1850, as a missionary agent of the Ladies' Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he rented and took possession of the old gin shop at the corner of Cross and Little Water streets and converted it into a chapel. James Gordon Bennett wrote at the time in "The Herald" that the drunkenness, and profanity, and licentiousness, and filthiness, and raggedness there confronted were enough to sicken and appal any but the very stoutest Christian heart. But Mr. Pease unflinchingly put his hands to the work. He opened his chapel as a work-room for all the wretched women of the locality who were willing to pledge themselves to abstain from drunkenness and vagrancy and attend Divine worship. Many came, and they did well and worked faithfully. After laboring for a time under the supervision of the New York Conference, Mr. Pease decided to enter alone upon the work of establishing a Permanent Industrial Home, which should afford not only the advantages of a workshop by day, but a home by night, in which those struggling to reform should be beyond the reach of temptation. The proprietors of the houses in the locality refused to lease him a tenement. Nothing daunted, he appealed to the law, and suppressed two notorious dens nearest the door of the old saloon; then used as his chapel, ejected their inmates, leased the houses and turned them into an Industrial Home. He took up his own abode with those wretched creatures whom he was striving to pluck from moral ruin. Then he turned his attention to the establishment of a day-school for vagrant children, and soon commenced a day-school with forty scholars. It rapidly increased, and was soon multiplied into several schools.

REV. LEWIS M. PEASE, (Founder of the Home.)

In two years he had succeeded in enlisting sufficient sympathy and support to warrant the conversion of the House of Industry into a permanent institution, with a Board of Directors. The institution grew until it occupied seven three-story houses on the Points. Mr. Pease believed that a farm in the suburbs would be a great auxiliary to the work. One was soon thereafter secured in Westchester County, about half its cost being obtained from his friends, and Mr. Pease making himself responsible for the remainder. Four years later a number of gentlemen formed an undenominational association in connection with Mr. Pease, and it was incorporated as "The Five Points House of Industry." They purchased a plot of ground on Anthony, near Water Street, on the north side of the park, immediately adjoining the notorious "Murderer's Alley," and "Cow Bay," on which they erected a substantial, well-ventilated, and commodious brick building, six stories high. To that the operations of Mr. Pease's es-

WOMAN'S OPPORTUNITY.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., on the Text: "She shall be called woman." Gen. 2: 23.

GOD, who can make no mistake, made man and woman for a specific work and to move in particular spheres—man to be reginant in his realm; woman to be dominant in hers. The boundary line between Italy and Switzerland, between England and Scotland, is not more thoroughly marked than this distinction between the empire masculine and the empire feminine. So entirely dissimilar are the fields to which God called them, that you can no more compare them than you can oxygen and hydrogen, water and grass, trees and stars. All this talk about the superiority of one sex to the other sex is an everlasting waste of ink and speech. A jeweler may have a scale so delicate that he can weigh the dust of diamonds; but where are the scales so delicate that you can weigh in them affection against affection, sentiment against sentiment, thought against thought, soul against soul, a man's world against a woman's world? You come out with your stereotyped remark that man is superior to woman in intellect; and then I open on my desk the swarthy, iron-tyed, thunder-bolted writings of Harriet Martineau, and Elizabeth Browning, and George Eliot. You come on with your stereotyped remark about woman's superiority to man in the item of affection; but I ask you where was there more capacity to love than in John the disciple—and Matthew Simpson the bishop and Henry Martyn, the missionary? The heart of those men was so large, that after you had rolled into it two hemispheres, there was room still left to marshal the hosts of heaven, and set up the throne of the eternal Jehovah. I deny to man the throne intellectual. I deny to woman the throne affectional. No human phraseology will ever define the spheres; while there is an intuition by which we know when a man is in his realm, and when a woman is in her realm, and when either of them is out of it. No bungling legislature ought to attempt to make a definition, or to say: "This is the line and that is the line." My theory is, that if a woman wants to vote, she ought to vote, and that if a man wants to embroider and keep house, he ought to be allowed to embroider and keep house. There are masculine women and there are effeminate men. My theory is that you have no right to interfere with any one's doing anything that is righteous. Albany and Washington might as well decree by legislation how high a brown-thrasher should fly, or how deep a trout should [illegible] as to try to settle the height and depth of woman's duty. The question of capacity will settle finally the whole question, the whole subject. When a woman is prepared to preach, she will preach, and [illegible] can hinder her. When a woman is prepared to move in highest commercial spheres, she will have great influence on the Exchange, and no boards of trade can hinder her. I want women to understand that heart and brain can overfly any barrier that politicians may set up, and that nothing can keep her back or keep her down but the question of incapacity.

I was in New Zealand last year just after the opportunity of suffrage had been conferred upon women. The plan worked well. There had never been such good order at the polls, and righteousness triumphed. Men have not made such a wonderful moral success of the ballot-box that they need fear women will corrupt it. In all our cities man has so nearly made the ballot-box a failure, suppose we let women try. But there are some women, I know, of most undesirable nature, who wander up and down the country—having no homes of their own, or forsaking their own homes—talking about their rights; and we know very well that they themselves are fit neither to vote nor to keep house. Their mission seems merely to humiliate the two sexes at the thought of what any one of us might become. No one would want to live under the laws that such women would enact, or to have cast upon society the children that such women would raise. But I shall show you that the best rights that woman can own, she already has in her possession; that her position in this country at this time is not one of commiseration, but one of congratulation; that the grandeur and power of her realm have never yet been appreciated; that she sits to-day on a throne so high that all the thrones of earth piled on top of each other would not make for her a footstool. Here is the platform on which she stands. Away down below it are the ballot-box and the Congressional assemblage and the Legislative hall. Woman always has voted and always will vote. Our great-grandfathers thought they were by their votes putting Washington into the presidential chair. No. His mother, by the principles she taught him, and by the habits she inculcated, made him President. It was a Christian mother's hand dropping the ballot when Lord Bacon wrote, and Newton philosophized, and Alfred the Great governed, and Jonathan Edwards thundered of judgment to come. How many men there have been in high political station who would have been insufficient to stand the test to which their moral principle was put, had it not been for a wife's voice that encouraged them to do right, and a wife's prayer that sounded louder than the clamor of partisanship! The right of suffrage, as we men exercise it, seems to be a feeble thing. You, a Christian man, come up to the ballot-box and you drop your vote. Right after you comes a libertine, or a sot—the offscouring of the street—and he drops his vote; and his vote counteracts yours. But if in the quiet of home-life a daughter by her Christian demeanor, a wife by her industry, a mother by her faithfulness, casts a vote in the right direction, then nothing can resist it, and the influence of that vote will throb through the eternities.

My chief anxiety, then, is, not that woman have other rights accorded her; but that she, by the grace of God, rise up to the appreciation of the glorious rights she already possesses. First: she has the right to make home happy. That realm no one has ever disputed with her. Men may come home at noon or at night, and then tarry a comparatively little while; but she, all day long, governs it, beautifies it, sanctifies it. It is within her power to make it the most attractive place on earth. It is the only calm harbor in this world. You know as well as I do, that this outside world and the business world, are a long scene of jostle and contention. The man who has a dollar struggles to keep it; the man who has it not struggles to get it. Prices up. Prices down. Losses. Gains. Misrepresentations. Underselling. Buyers depreciating; salesmen exaggerating. Tenants seeking less rent; landlords demanding more. Struggles about office. Men who are in trying to keep in; men out trying to get in. Slips. Tumbles. Defalcations. Panics. Catastrophes. Oh, woman! thank God you have a home, and that you may be queen in it. Better be there than wear Victoria's coronet. Better be there than carry the purse of a princess. Your abode may be humble, but you can, by your faith in God, and your cheerfulness of demeanor, gild it with splendors such as an upholsterer's hand never yet kindled. There are abodes in every city—humble, two stories; four plain, unpapered rooms; undesirable neighborhood; and yet there is a man who would die on the threshold rather than surrender. Why? It is home. Whenever he thinks of it he sees angels of God hovering around it. The ladders of heaven are let down to that house. Over the child's rough crib there are the chantings of angels as those that broke over Bethlehem. It is home. These children may come up after awhile, and they may win high position, and they may have an affluent residence; but they will not until their dying day forget that humble roof, under which their father rested, and their mother sang, and their sisters played. Oh, if you would gather up all tender memories, all the lights and shades of the heart, all banquetings and reunions, all filial, fraternal, paternal and conjugal affections, and you had only just four letters with which to spell out that height and depth, and length, and breadth, and magnitude, and eternity of meaning, you would, with streaming eyes, and trembling voice, and agitated hand, write it out in those four living capitals, H-O-M-E.

What right does woman want that is grander than to be queen in such a realm? Why, the eagles of heaven cannot fly across that dominion. Horses, panting and with lathered flanks, are not swift enough to run to the outpost of that realm. They say that the sun never sets upon the English empire; but I have to tell you that on this realm of woman's influence, eternity never marks any bound. Isabella fled from the Spanish throne, pursued by the nation's anathema; but she who is queen in a home will never lose her throne, and death itself will only be the annexation of heavenly principalities.

When you want to get your grandest idea of a queen, you do not think of Catherine of Russia, or of Anne of England, or Marie Theresa of Germany; but when you want to get your grandest idea of a queen, you think of the plain woman who sat opposite your father at the table, or walked with him arm-in-arm down life's pathway; sometimes to the Thanksgiving banquet, sometimes to the grave, but always together—soothing your petty griefs, correcting your childish waywardness, joining in your infantile sports, listening to your evening prayers, toiling for you with needle, or at the spinning-wheel, and on cold nights wrapping you up snug and warm. And then at last on that day when she lay in the back room dying, and you saw her take those thin hands with which she had toiled for you so long, and put them together in a dying prayer that commended you to the God whom she had taught you to trust—Oh, she was the queen! The chariots of God came down to fetch her; and as she went in, all heaven rose up. You cannot think of her now without a rush of tenderness that stirs the deep foundations of your soul, and you feel as much a child again as when you cried on her lap; and if you could bring her back again to speak just once more your name, as tenderly as she used to speak it, you would be willing to throw yourself on the ground and k[illegible] the sod that covers her, crying: "Moth[illegible] mother!" Ah! she was the queen—[illegible] was the queen. Now, can you tell me h[illegible] many thousand miles a woman like [illegible] would have to travel down before she [illegible] to the ballot-box. Compared with [illegible] work of training kings and queens [illegible] God and eternity, how insignificant se[illegible] all this work of voting for aldermen [illegible] common councilmen, and sheriffs, and [illegible] stables, and mayors, and presidents! [illegible] make one such grand woman as I have [illegible] scribed, how many thousands would [illegible] want of those people who go in the ro[illegible] of fashion and dissipation, going as fa[illegible] ward disgraceful apparel as they dare [illegible] so as not to be arrested by the police—[illegible] behavior a sorrow to the good and a [illegible] cature of the vicious, and an insult to [illegible] God who made them women and not [illegible] gons, and tramping on, down through [illegible] frivolous and dissipated life, to temp[illegible] and eternal damnation.

Oh, woman, with the lightning of [illegible] soul, strike dead at your feet all these [illegible] lurements to dissipation and to fast[illegible] Your immortal soul cannot be fed [illegible] such garbage. God calls you up to [illegible] pire and dominion. Will you have [illegible] Oh, give to God your heart; give to [illegible] all your best energies; give to God [illegible] your culture; give to God all your re[illegible] ment; give yourself to him, for this w[illegible] and the next. Soon all these bright eyes [illegible] be quenched, and these voices will be h[illegible] ed. For the last time you will look [illegible] this fair earth. Father's hand, moth[illegible] hand, sister's hand, child's hand wi[illegible] more be in yours. It will be night, [illegible] there will come up a cold wind from [illegible] Jordan, and you must start. Will it [illegible] lone woman on a trackless moor? [illegible] no. Jesus will come up in that hour [illegible] offer his hand, and he will say: "[illegible] stood by me when you were well; n[illegible] will not desert you when you are si[illegible] One wave of his hand, and the storm [illegible] drop; and another wave of his hand, [illegible] midnight shall break into midnoon; [illegible] another wave of his hand, and the ch[illegible] berlains of God will come down from [illegible] treasure-houses of heaven, with robes [illegible] trous, blood-washed and heaven-glinte[illegible] which you will array yourself for the [illegible] riage supper of the Lamb. And then h[illegible] Miriam, who struck the timbrel of the [illegible] Sea; and with Deborah, who led [illegible] Lord's host into the fight; and with Han[illegible] who gave her Samuel to the Lord; [illegible] with Mary, who rocked Jesus to [illegible] while there were angels singing in the [illegible] and with sisters of charity, who boun[illegible] the battle-wounds of the Crimea, you [illegible] from the chalice of God, drink to the s[illegible] eternal rescue.

Your dominion is home, O wom[illegible]! What a brave fight for home the wome[illegible] Ohio made some ten or fifteen years [illegible] when they banded together and in n[illegible] of the towns and cities of that State mar[illegible] in procession, and by prayer and Chri[illegible] songs shut up more places of dissip[illegible] than were ever counted. Were they op[illegible] again? Oh yes. But is it not a [illegible] thing to shut up the gates of hell for [illegible] or three months? It seemed that men [illegible] gaged in the business of destroying o[illegible] did not know how to cope with this [illegible] of warfare. They knew how to figh[illegible] Maine Liquor Law, and they knew ho[illegible] to fight the National Temperance Society [illegible] they knew how to fight the Sons of [illegible] perance and Good Samaritans; but [illegible] Deborah appeared upon the scene, S[illegible] took to his feet and got to the mount[illegible]. It seems that they did not know ho[illegible] to contend against "Coronation," and "[illegible] Hundred," and "Brattle Street," and "[illegible] any," they were so very intangible. T[illegible] men found that they could not accom[illegible] much against that kind of warfare, a[illegible] one of the cities a regiment was bro[illegible] out all armed to disperse the women. [illegible] came down in battle array; but oh, [illegible] poor success! for that regiment was [illegible] up of gentlemen, and gentlemen do no[illegible] to shoot women with hymn-books in [illegible] hats. Oh, they found that gunning for feule prayer-meetings was a very poor business! No real damage was done, although there was threat of violence after that of violence all over the land. I really think if the women of the East had as much faith in God as their sisters of the West have and the same recklessness of human crilism, I really believe that in one month three-fourths of the grog-shops of our cities would be closed, and there would be running through the gutters of the streets, Brandy, and Cognac, and Heidsick, and old Port, and Schiedam Schnapps, and lager beer, and you would save your fathers and your husbands, and your sons, first from a drunkard's grave, and, second, from a drunkard's hell! To this base for home let all women rouse themselves. Thank God for our early home. Think God for our present home. Thank God for the coming home in heaven.

The twilight, after I had been playing with the children for some time, I lay down on the lounge to rest. The children said, play more. Children always want to play more. And, half asleep and half awake, I seemed to dream this dream: It seemed to me that I was in a far-distant land—not Persia, although more than Oriental luxuriance crowned the cities; nor the tropics—although more than tropical fruitfulness filled the gardens; nor Italy—although more than Italian softness filled the air. And I wandered around, looking for thorns and nettles, but I found none of them grew there.

And I walked forth and I saw the sunrise, and I said: "When will it set again?" and the sun sank not. And I saw all the people in holiday apparel, and I said: "When do they put on working-mans garb again, and delve in the mine, and welter at the forge?" but neither the garments nor the robes did they put off. And I wandered in the suburbs, and I said: "Where do they bury the dead of this great city?" and I looked along by the hills where it would be most beautiful for the dead to sleep, and I saw castles, and towns, and battlements; but not a mausoleum, nor monument, nor white slab could I see. And I went into the great chapel of the town, and I said: "Where do the poor worship? where are the benches on which the sit?" and a voice answered: "We have no poor in this great city." And I wandered out, seeking to find the place where were the hovels of the destitute; and I found mansions of amber and ivory and gold but no tear did I see or sigh hear. I was bewildered; and I sat under the shadow of a great tree, and I said: "What am I, and whence comes all this?" And at that moment there came from among the leaves, skipping up the flowery paths and across the sparkling waters, a very bright and sparkling group; and when I saw their step I knew it, and when I heard their voices I thought I knew them; but their apparel was so different from anything I had ever seen I bowed a stranger to strangers. But after awhile, when they clapped their hands, and shouted: "Welcome! welcome!" the mystery was solved, and I saw that time had passed, and that eternity had come, and that God had gathered us up to a higher home; and I said: "Are we all here?" and the voices of innumerable generations answered: "All here"; and while tears of gladness were raining down our cheeks, and the branches of Lebanon trees were clapping their hands, and the towers of the great city were chiming their welcome, we began to laugh and sing, and leaped and shout: "Home! home! home!" when I felt a child's hand on my face, and it woke me. The children wanted to play more. Children always want to play more.

tablishment were transferred. In 1864 they succeeded in obtaining the adjoining property that had so long had an infamous notoriety for its horrid deeds of crime and blood, and in 1869, in connection with the "City Mission and Tract Society," they erected upon it a large addition building, containing the Calvary Chapel, school-rooms, play-rooms, and dormitories. Mr. Pease resigned the superintendency of the institution in 1857, and was followed successively by Messrs. Talcott, Barlow, Halliday and Barnard.

In 1855 it was decided to erect a large building, and a structure costing thirty-six thousand dollars was built upon the site of one of the vilest spots of the locality. It was a brick edifice, seven stories in height, containing a chapel, school-rooms, work-rooms, dining-rooms, a bakery, dormitories, and every needful arrangement. In a few years its success was assured, and Mr. James M. Talcott, of Westboro, Mass., was installed as Superintendent. In April, 1857, Mr. Pease retired from the field, his health seriously impaired; but the institution he founded continued to carry on the glorious work he had so self-sacrificingly begun.

For over forty years the Five Points House of Industry has exerted a tremendous moral influence in lower New York. Almost every nationality under the sun has been represented in the multitudes that have been rescued from vice and crime, sheltered there and led to better and useful lives. Thousands upon thousands of misery-stricken children have been placed by means of its operations in the homes of respectable families throughout the country. It has blended physical relief and secular instruction with religious enlightenment and cultivation and has furnished a successful model for a number of other institutions of a similar character. Every passing year has seen its expansion, and its anniversary meetings have been attended by large gatherings of eminent Christian men and women from many cities, who took a special interest in its reformatory and educational work and in the bands of happy, healthful children, who were present in large numbers on such occasions.

MR. PEASE'S FIRST QUARTERS.

Very simple are the methods of work that have brought about so much success in the Five Points House of Industry. The children—for, of course, the work nearly always begins with them—are first gathered off the streets. They are for the most part orphans and outcasts or the neglected offspring of drunken parents. They are treated kindly, made clean and comfortable, and taught some simple exercises. In its chapel, dormitories, school-rooms and play-rooms, they begin a new and orderly life, leaving behind the old vagabond existence of the streets. Gradually they are introduced to the working routine of the Home and made to feel its moral atmosphere. Industrial as well as reformatory influences soon produce a beneficial change in the inmates. The children are kept in cheerful, airy school-rooms during school hours, taught as thoroughly and trained as faithfully as are the pupils of our common schools, and provided daily with substantial meals. The manual training includes carpenter work, typesetting and printing, farm work, and other lines of labor for the boys, and cooking, sewing, and housework for the girls. They become well behaved, industrious and obedient. The House of Industry is strictly undenominational, and during the forty years of its existence has rescued and educated over 45,000 children besides affording temporary shelter for several thousand destitute women. It has expended in that time nearly $1,500,000, but the rich results accomplished, in a material and spiritual sense, to a great army of little ones cannot be computed in figures, or set down in words.

Viewed from every point of practical usefulness, the House of Industry is the most perfect institution of its kind to be found on this continent. It would require many columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to describe in detail its excellent system and various features. Among those not hitherto enumerated is a Charity Day School for the poor children of the neighborhood who are not inmates of the Home. Besides this, there is connected with the institution a Home for Working Women, at Mott and Elizabeth streets, where 400 persons can be accommodated, and a Chinese Mission, both of which have succeeded in doing excellent service in their respective spheres. The House of Industry has also been a temporary shelter for thousands of children, who have had a mother, or father, or perhaps both, living, but who, because of poverty or sickness, have not been able to provide for their offspring. A very larger percentage of the proteges of the House have succeeded in life, and their letters to their former instructors are among the brightest incidents of the work. Thousands testify to the beneficence of its system, and the memory of the months and years spent under its roof is cherished in a multitude of grateful hearts all over the world. It has accomplished what no machinery of government availed to do. Thousands of children have been rescued from the streets and had their feet set in a better way. The work still goes on increasing, and knows no creed or nationality. The House of Industry is an enormous nursery-school, with an average of more than four hundred day-scolars and constant boarders, outsiders and insiders. "It is one of the most touching sights in the world," writes Mr. Jacob Rus, the well-known philanthropist and author, "to see a score of babies rescued from homes of brutality and desolation, where no other blessing than a drunken curse was ever heard, saying their prayers in the nursery at bed-time. Too often their white night-gowns hide tortured little bodies and limbs cruelly bruised by inhuman hands. In the shelter of this fold they are safe, and a happier little group one may seek long and far in vain."

Work on the new building, to replace the condemned structure, has already begun. One hundred thousand dollars are needed to complete it, and this sum the managers hope to receive through contributions from those who are interested in the rescue of the children of the streets. At present, owing to the lack of accommodadations, many applicants for admission are being turned away daily. An effort will also be made to secure contributions for a summer home for the children at Bell Island, Conn. The officers of the House of Industry are: Wm. F. Barnard, Superintendent; Hugh N. Camp, Treasurer; and George F. Betts, David S. Eggleston, Geo. H. Morgan, Walter H. Lewis, Charles Lanier, Oliver Harriman, Morris K. Jesup, H. N. Camp, and Henry E. Hawley, Trustees.

THE POPE'S APPEAL.

As our readers have doubtless learned from the daily papers the Pope recently sent an open letter to the English people expressing the hope that they would return to the Roman Catholic faith. A lady who is living in Spain sends to an English journal the following sarcastic comment which appeared in "El Diluvis," an influential Spanish paper: "Leo XIII. has addressed a letter to the English people, in which he commends in detail the religious spirit of that nation. But he further adds that God will not bless the efforts of the English race until they return once more to the fold of the Catholic Church! Now we understand the reason of England's sad decay, whereas Spain and Italy swim in a sea of prosperity. The latter are Catholic, the former is Protestant. On how little depends the prosperity of a nation!"

To this, the translator adds: "As you will perceive, the language is sarcastic, but it has a deep and true meaning. England, thanks to the entrance and free course of that Word which 'giveth light,' has prospered in temporal as well as in spiritual affairs, whereas Italy and Spain, especially the latter, enslaved by the doctrines and traditions of men, have sunk to the depth of poverty, ignorance, and misery. To be readmitted to the Catholic 'fold,' England would have to relinquish first among her dearly-bought liberties her open Bible. Rome's hatred of the Word of Life never changes. Of this we have constant proofs in this unhappy country. A few weeks ago, the rector of this little town publicly burned a number of portions of Scripture he had collected from the children and young people who attended his Lenten classes for religious instruction. He imposed as a condition to their receiving the Communion at Easter that they should deliver to him all Protestant books in their possession."

"MARTHA'S REST OPENED."

MANY will remember reading an article in these columns last November, concerning the "Home for Tired Workers" at Saratoga, N. Y. The story of the peculiar Providence, that after five years of praying and waiting, had at last opened the way for a Rest Home, at Saratoga Springs, attracted considerable attention at the time. "Martha's Rest" for Seif-supporting Women, was formally opened last week. The Rest is designed to secure the benefits of the life-giving air and spring waters to the class above all others who need it most, and who have hitherto been shut out from such privileges. Nine applications are already filed from those who by reason of ill-health or lack of employment are unable to pay even the nominal sum of $3.50 per week required. Thus far, provision has been made for only one free occupant at the Home.

The desire and prayer of the founder is, to set aside at least four rooms (allowing two in each) for the free reception of worthy and deserving workers from the large cities. $150 will endow a double room for five persons for the entire season. $300 will secure a two-weeks' rest to thirty-two weary ones.

The young woman occupying the only free room to-day, is a gentlewoman of education and culture, who was thrown upon her own resources only two years ago. She had been reared with tender care, and the hard struggle for daily bread at occupation far beyond her small strength, so undermined her constitution that she is on the verge of a speedy decline. She is only one of a score to whose plea for rest a deaf ear must be turned unless the power is given through generous contributors to try and save them.

All desiring information concerning the Home can address Mrs. Alida Stanwood, 21 Bible House, New York.

AN ANCIENT PALACE UNEARTHED.

M. de Sarzic recently excavated at Tello, Asia Minor, the ruins of the palace of the most ancient kings of Chaldaas, about 4,000 years B. C. Tablets were found in the walls describing King Entemena as the Protector of Agriculture. Among his plantations were two sacred groves dedicated to two different heathen deities, Ninharsag, Godess of Mountains and Mother of Gods, and the Goddess Nina, a waternymph.

Quantities of the remains of what had once been extensive aqueducts which once rendered the plain of Tello fertile were found. Date trees formed extensive forests, and the ancient inhabitants celebrated in verse the 360 benefits of the date tree, which comprised the principal wealth of the country at that period.

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER.

Sunday School Lesson for June 30. Golden Text, Hebrews 12: 2.

JERUSALEM was the central scene of the series of events which come within the compass of the Review Lesson. In and around that city Christ spent the last weeks of his sojourn on earth. Galilee, where so much of his teaching and healing had been done, was to know him no more, except in the fitful mysterious appearances of his resurrection body. The occurrences of those weeks were the most momentous in the world's history. Their influence has grown and extended far and wide from generation to generation through the eighteen centuries which have elapsed since they took place, and must inevitably go on increasing to the end of time. None of the battles which have decided the fate of empires, none of the revolutions which have changed the destinies of nations, has had results so widespread and so permanent in influence as the events of the period comprised in the Review. Multitudes of all races, and of every clime and time, who know nothing and care nothing for Marathon, or Waterloo, or Sedan, are profoundly affected by the incidents of those weeks in the little, despised land of Judæa, and base upon them their hopes for eternity. Commencing with the Triumphal Entry into the City, which probably took place on Sunday, April 2d, of the year 30, and closing with the Ascension, which is supposed to have occurred on May 18th of the same year, we have a period that is the focus of the lines of all past and future human history. Within it, was achieved the culmination of the sublime work of the redemption of the race. The revelation of God to men, in the person of Jesus, came during those few weeks to its highest development. Then it was seen how God loved the world. The patient suffering, the self-sacrifice even to death, the glorious triumph over death and the grave, were all necessary that men might be rescued from sin and come into the possession of the privileges with which God had endowed his creatures. It was the exaltation on the pinnacle of pain and sorrow, to which Christ referred early in his ministry, when he said, "If I be lifted up, I will draw all men unto me." That strange, mysterious magnetism has been going forth from the Cross ever since, and by supernatural power has been drawing men out of the mire, out of the fetters that held them and starting them on the way upward which leads to God himself. In describing the events of that time and explaining their significance, the Christian teacher is giving effect to Christ's work and sending forward into the next generation the power that can redeem it and consecrate it. The five pictures on this page, reproduced from actual photographs of the scenes identified with the solemn events of the last ten lessons to be reviewed may serve to suggest the grouping of the lessons which have been considered during the quarter. The field of Judas, reminding us of the awful sin of treachery to Christ; the Garden of Gethsemane, with its lesson of the terrific burden of sin; The Arch of Pilate, where he set Christ, calling on the people to "Behold the man," who can still save all who look to him by faith; Golgotha, where he "bore our sins in his own body on the tree" and the Mount of Olives from which he was caught up into heaven the Conquetor from the world's battle field — each has its own special life-giving lesson to teach. Io rightly understand these scenes is to grasp the essential truths of Christianity. They inspire love to Christ and loyalty to him which is of supreme importance.

I will deliver him unto you. (Matt. 26: 15.) The character of Judas is odious throughout Christendom. The world instinctively despises a treacherous man. A story is told of a slave in the Mauritius who toiled and saved the small gratuities that were given him in the hope of purchasing his freedom. His little hoard grew; but he changed his purpose. A son was born to him whom he loved passionately. He resolved to give his money for his boy's freedom. It would be better, he thought, for the boy might make something of life while for him it would be too late. He determined to die in slavery that his son might be free. But just at the time that he was about to arrange for the purchase, the lad fell ill and died. At first, in his sorrow and disappointment, he thought that now he would resume his original purpose and purchase his own freedom; but the spirit of self-sacrifice had entered the old man's heart. There was a bright boy on the plantation about the age of his boy and the two lads had been friends. He resolved to give his hoard to set this boy free. The bargain was made and the boy was emancipated. The old man saw with pleasure that he was making his way. He would have been glad if the boy had come to see him occasionally; but not once did he come. A great crime was committed on the island and the old man fell under suspicion. Knowing that he would not have a fair trial, though he was innocent, he fled. A reward was offered his capture and it was earned by the ve youth who owed his emancipation to self-sacrifice. He it was who gave up benefactor to death for the sake of mon

THE TRUTH ABOUT INDIA.

M. S. C. K. Rutnam Gives Important Information as to the State of Religion in India and Corrects some Erroenous Statements about Hinduism.

A CALL was made at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office a few days ago, by Mr. S. C. Rutnam, a young man from Western India, who will probably become widely known to the religious public during his stay in this country. He is a native of Ceylon, but has been for some time one of the teachers of an advanced school in Bombay Presidency. He is the son of a native preacher and is a highly educated young man, speaking excellent English, with a slight accent, which gives an eloquant charm to his conversation. Mr. Rutnam's object in leaving his home in India for a tour in America and Great Britain, is to correct certain misconceptions which recent events have produced and which can be set right only by one possessing a personal and intimate knowledge of the state of society in India. He has messages for both lands; for each is liable to be misled by statements which have obtained wide circulation. Mr. Rutnam wants to talk to Americans about some misleading statements made by his countrymen at the Parliament of Religions, which was held two years ago at Chicago, and he has been disabusing the English mind of a flattering notion about the opium traffic, which has been produced by the report of a Royal Commission. The report was designed to set English conscience at rest by representing opium, hemp, etc., as harmless drugs, which it was no sin to raise and sell. Mr. Rutnam went armed with facts and statistics which utterly discredit that report and did not rouse the English conscience to a state of healthy activity. He says:

"I am in the Belgaum district, Bombay Presidency, Western India, which is a very populous section, the population of the town of Belgaum being about 60,000. It is near the sea coast, about 200 miles south of Poona, close to the headquarters of the Mahratta kings. We have a native church and an English Congregational church in the city, and a number of small churches in the surrounding villages. I have been two years in Belgaum, attached to the Mission High School which is connected with the London Missionary Society. We have a principal, a superintendent missionary, and I am in charge of the Matriculation Class in that school. I am also Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., which I founded two years ago. We hold meetings in the school building. Although the membership is only thirty, at ordinary meetings we get eighty or ninety, many of whom are believers at heart but through fear of the people will not identify themselves with any Christian society or organization. I know of several young men who would gladly come to our meetings and partake in our religious worship, if they were sure their friends would know nothing about it. Many a father would expel his boy from his house if he should become a Christian. He would be cut from all social connections.

"Our Y. M. C. A. delegated me to go to England and speak against the opium traffic, and I have been engaged during the last nine months in lecturing against the traffic in the leading cities of England. We had very large audiences, and have been able to disabuse the public mind there of the preconceived notions about the harmlessness of opium, which has come to be generally believed since the appointment of the Royal Commission on Opium. The consumption of opium is increasing in India. At first it was grown principally for export to China, but now the natives of India themselves are using it.

The chief difficulty in the way of the propagation of Christianity in India is that the Hindu is conservative, and is very suspicious about receiving anything foreign, nevertheless, I firmly believe Christianity is progressing in my country, and one day it will become the national religion of India. The rising generation has no longer faith in the old religious systems of the country, and a sort of unbelief and scepticism prevail among the student class. It is gratifying to note that there are many secret disciples of Jesus Christ among the educated people."

The influence of the Parliament of Religions, Mr. Rutnam thinks, has been baleful. He says:

"Whatever may have been the motives of the conveners of the Parliament of Religions, I am afraid many people of India have been led to believe that the Parliament implied that you were disposed to place all religions on an equal footing. They mistook the attitude of the American people, and did not realize how far you allowed truth to give way to courtesy.

MR. S. C. K. RUTNAM OF BELGAUM, INDIA.

A TYPICAL CULTURED HINDU FAMILY—MR. RUTNAM'S PARENTS AND THEIR FAMILY.

"I fear also that the Parliament has done immense injury to the cause of truth by bringing into notoriety a number of obscure individuals who, without giving any serious thought to the study of religion, took upon themselves the task of enlightening the American public as to the essential nature of the Hindu religion. The Hinduism which Swami Vivekananda expounded at the World's Parliament of Religions, and which seems to have taken so much with the American public, was nothing but a crude patching up of the elevating doctrines of Christianity on a basis of old Vedantism, which is simply pantheism. The horrible side of Hinduism with which we are so familiar in India was not presented at Chicago, and is unknown to the people of this country.

"I feel it my duty in common justice to make a reply to the statements of Swami Vivekananda on Hinduism and Christian missions in India. He tries to prove the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, and the Hindu theory that creation is without beginning or end. He seeks to prove this latter by a most fallacious argument. He defines creation as combination, and we most emphatically hold that creation does not mean combination. We do not understand science as Swami Vivekananda understands it. Real science corroborates the fundamental principles of religion. It is illogical and irrational to seek to bring God under the ordinary laws of being and conditions of existence. The Hindu cannot understand the present life without supposing there was a former life, and Swami Vivekananda would have the American public believe that there are people who have a complete reminiscence of their former life. I come from the land of Mahatmas, but I must confess that I have not seen one, personally, nor have I come across any one who has seen them.

"When we have followed Swami Vivekananda in his metaphysical speculations to prove that creation is without beginning or end, and that souls migrate from one body to another, let us pause a little and ask ourselves what message he brought and what Gospel he had to preach to the American public. His Gospel is that 'men are divinities on earth, that men are not sinners. It is a sin to call a man sinner. It is a standing libel on human nature.' He makes statements contrary to all human experience and the dictates of our individual moral sense and the conscience of mankind in general. According to the Bible, 'If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.'"

"Are the sacred Vedas the good books that were described to us?" Mr. Rutnam was asked.

"The Hindus have four Vedas. One of the four is the Jagur Veda, which is so bad that the highest legal authority at Bombay has declared it a criminal offense to translate it into any living language. We know a translator and publisher in Punjab who was fined for publishing a translation in Gujerati. The obscene pictures in Hindu temples and the obscene carvings and sculptures in Hindu temple cars show what Hinduism was 2,000 years ago. Modern Hinduism is as bad. One can best understand Hinduism by studying it in India, as it is practised by the people in general.

"As regards Swami Vivekananda's attack on Indian Christians and Indian missionaries, I think it is unworthy of serious consideration. If the missionary has done nothing else, the work he has accomplished in emancipating Hindu women, alone would justify all the expense incurred, and would reward the labors expended. The struggles of Mr. Alfred Dyer, and missionaries like him, to save our girls from the hideous child-marriages, though not entirely successful, and while yet much remains to be done, have resulted in marvelous changes in the customs of the country. The missionaries have also been the pioneers of education.

"Swami Vivekananda says: 'I deny that the conditions of the lower classes are made any better by Christianity.' I need only ask him to read the following from the 'Hindu,' a paper edited by Hindus for Hindus: 'They [the lower classes] are perfectly right in seeking from Christianity the advantages which the religion of their own country has refused to give them, and as Mr. Srinivara Raghara Iyengar (a prominent Hindu) said: "Their best chance of rising in social position lies in their embracing the religion of the ruling class." The Christian portion of the Indian community deserve every help and encouragement that the missionaries can give them. They have been taken out of their own indigenous position through this agency and are entitled to all possible support from their deliverers and benefactors,' etc.

"If I mistake not, Swami Vivekananda himself owes his education to a Christian mission institution, and he is in himself a conspicuous illustration of the sophistry of his own statements."

The group in the photograph, on this page shows the parents of Mr. Rutnam, his three brothers, four sisters, his brother-in-law, and his nephew and nieces. They are a typical educated Hindu family. Two brothers were graduated from Madras University, and the youngest has passed his examination for the degree of Bachelor of Arts. The sisters are also being educated. The oldest brother is Secretary of a Y. M. C. A. at Salem, and the younger one a Professor in a college in Calcutta. The brother-in-law, D. M. Kanaga Rutnam Pillai, is the leading Christian lawyer at Salem; Mr. Rutnam's father has been a minister of the American Board at Jaffna, Ceylon, for twenty-five years, where he is still laboring, and is familiarly known as the "Rev. Christmas." His mother, who was a school mistress in a Ceylon school, is a lady of brilliant ability. While at college she wrote a history of the world which is in use in the schools. She speaks English much better than any of her children. It is extremely gratifying to find a family so intelligent, working for Christ in that great land. It is also encouraging to learn that they are working in the full confidence of final success.

Mr. Rutnam is delivering lectures on the following subjects: "The present religious outlook in India;" "The progress of Christianity;" "The greatest national sin of England;" "Temperance;" "The Yankees of India;" "The women of India, and other Oriental matters." Churches or Societies desiring more knowledge of his wonderful country may arrange with him for lectures by writing to him at 128 East 23d Street, New York.

YOUR OWN BUSINESS.

LET every denomination manage its own affairs. Their belligerencies will sooner end if we let them alone. In ecclesiastical as well as other courtships, three are one too many. We once went in to settle a riot at Belleville between the Irish and the negroes. Brickbats were freely flying, but we had a notion that we could calm the perturbations. We cried peace, but there was no peace. Our Irish friends thought that we were siding with the negroes, and the negroes thought we were siding with the Irish, and we got hit from both sides; and instead of quelling the riot, we ourselves came near being quelled.

We came back from that reading of the riot act to adopt the policy of letting our neighbors settle their own disputes, social and ecclesiastical. But while we do better to stand off from all internecine wars, we shall do all we can to settle the misunderstandings between denomination and denomination. We would like to bring all the sects together in one great brotherhood, and at the convocation we would have "a baptistry," "an anxious seat," a Prayer-book, and a Westminster Catechism. We would cool all strife by a plunge in the baptistry, and get all down on the anxious seat seeking for pardon, and out of the Westminster Catechism would teach them what is the chief end of man, while with the liturgy open before us we would all cry, "Good Lord, deliver us!" Now you are confounded at this, and are inquisitive to know whether we ourselves are Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, or Episcopalians. Indeed, we have scores of letters during the year asking to what we belong. In hope, therefore, of putting that question completely at rest, we reply that we belong to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

CRAZY MINISTERS.

SOME one sends us a newspaper with a list of four ministers who recently have become insane, the newspaper having a marginal note desiring us to explain. We have no capacity to demonstrate the certain cause of such clerical dementation, but we may imagine several reasons for such disaster. Perhaps they may have lost their balance through a large number of begging letters. They may by every mail have been solicited for money that they did not possess. They may have been violently charged with stinginess for postponing immediate response. For instance, we have on our table a pile of letters from the suffering regions, asking for relief; from Western Sunday Schools, who want a new library; from a young man, who needs a new suit of clothes; from a woman in Pennsylvania, who says her husband is unable to support her; from England, Ireland, and Scotland, asking for help in the building of chapels,—a heavy rain of applications that is enough to set any man's brain afloat; and we may imagine that some of the persons spoken of in that newspaper were mentally swamped in that way.

Another possible cause for the seeming epidemic of insanity among the clergy may be the demands of lecturing committees who want you to speak in behalf of their church or Young Men's Christian Association, and who persist in having you go after your telling them it is impossible. They break through all your established hours of privacy. They wake you up after you have gone to bed, or stop you in the street with their long yarn of necessity. If that will not make a minister crazy, nothing will.

We present another possible cause for the series of intellectual collapses, spoken of in the newspaper article aforesaid, in the exorbitant and unreasonable demand for impossible pastoral service. They may have been confused by the attempt to attend three funerals at the same hour, three miles distant from each other. Being able to go to but one of the three, of course the other two families will feel that they have been outrageously neglected. They will write sharp letters, talk profusely through the congregation, and possibly leave the church in high dudgeon. The attempt of a minister to be in three places at once will naturally divide and shatter his intellect. We do not know that the above causes worked in the unfortunate cases referred to, but we only assign them as sufficient cause of aberration. We are not surprised, like our correspondent, that there are so many lunatic ministers, but rather amazed that there are so few. It is a matter of congratulation that, under the pressure, there are so many clear-headed clergymen.

GIVING THE PITCH.

WE are glad at the increasing effort everywhere being made to sing the human race to heaven. There are tens of thousands of people who cannot be touched by argument or facts of rhetoric, who immediately surrender to sacred song. Thankful are we for so many singing evangelists who are with silver wedge of music splitting open the barred dungeons of the soul to let God and heaven go in and take full possession. Let us band together the sweet singers of our churches and Sunday Schools, not into stilted and formal choirs, but into crusading parties, whose business it shall be to rouse prayer-meetings, and visit sick-rooms, and serenade with sacred carols the homes of the unbelieving. When preaching and solemn admonition and a square talk fail of their work, try singing. Thousands have already climbed heavenward on the eight notes, and we imagine that in coming time a large proportion of the race are to go up on the same ladder.

TIRED LITERARY FOLKS.

THERE are many new kinds of pen being manufactured, but no man has yet been able to invent a pen that will not get weary. We have often had hold of a pen that seemed determined to skip and gambol. It leaped from paragraph to paragraph. It flew from simile to trope. It made a dash as it went. It slurred unimportant events. It threw interjections of surprise, and interrogations of inquiry, and hour after hour rushed along the line. But after awhile it was sure to get weary. It stumbled. It dragged. It blotted. It staggered. And after awhile it dropped as though dead. Talk of weary legs and arms; let some one tell us the story of weary pens. They may be found late at night in editorial rooms, and on reportorial desks, and in the hand of poet, essayist, romancist, and historian. For the most part they hunger for more bread, and yawn for more sleep, and, worn out, long for the grave of obliteration. Kept in a fine case at Abbotsford, you may find the expired pen of Walter Scott, and in the venerable Hall of Philadelphia the pen which signed the Declaration of Independence. But post-mortem honors are seldom awarded to deceased quills. They are generally thrown away. They drop into the dust and are trod on, and the places that knew them once know them no more. But our chief sympathy is for the living pens, which write and write, and wish they could die. Nothing in all the world has such hard work in making a livelihood as pen and pencil. The one languishes in the picture gallery, the other faints in the study. May the day speed on when literature and art shall come to higher appreciation. That will be the Elysium of pen and pencil.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Constant Reader, Brooklyn, N. Y. How can a person forgive one who has wronged him, if he does not care to be forgiven, and in his own opinion has never done anything he is sorry for?

See answer to New Haven, Conn., in THE MAIL-BAG of May 19, 1895.

Mrs. Charles Brown, Owen's Sound, Ont., Can. Will any of your readers tell me where I can procure the poem beginning:

Eternity! Eternity! Mark well, oh man, Eternity;
Came there a bird each thousandth year,
A sand-grain from the hills to bear,
When all is vanished, grain by grain,
Eternity would still remain.

E. H. U., New Knoxville, O. 1. Does the command, "Six days shalt thou labor," imply that we are to work all day and every day of the six? 2. What is meant by some of the dead not being raised until after the thousand years are finished (Rev. 20: 5?

1. No, it was a limitation. The work was not to exceed six days. There was to be a day of rest once in seven. 2. That the dead in Christ would be raised at Christ's coming to reign on the earth, while the wicked dead would not be raised until the general judgment at the end of his reign of a thousand years.

E. C. V., Collinsville, Tex. You say in your Sunday School lessons that it was probably in the year 30 that Christ was crucified. Was he then only thirty years old?

It is believed that he was thirty-three years and a few months old when he was crucified. Dionysius Exiguus, who fixed the date of the Christian æra, made a mistake of four years. The light we now have on the subject proves that he was in error. The Herod who slew the children in the year of Christ's birth died at least three years before the beginning of the Christian æra. Christ, therefore, would be in his thirty-fourth year in the year thirty, according to the calculations of modern scholars.

L. E. C., Boston, Mass. Is it true that there are Greek words in the book of Daniel which prove that it was not written during the Babylonish captivity, nor until long afterwards?

In the whole book there are only two, or at most, three such words. The Talmud states that the book was "edited by the men of the great Synagogue." It is reasonably possible that they may have inserted the words. If the words in the original had become antiquated, or had changed their meaning, as words do, in the course of time, it would be legitimate for an editor to put in their place modern words, which expressed the meaning of the prophet. Whatever arguments there may be for a recent date for the book, the one based on the two Greek words is not sufficient to prove the theory.

S. T. B., Woodsonville, Ky. If the three disciples who accompanied Christ into the Garden of Gethsemane were asleep, how is it known what words he uttered?

One of the functions of the Holy Spirit was to bring all things to the remembrance or knowledge of the Apostles. Though the Evangelists record most fully the events they witnessed, they record other matters of which they could have had no knowledge except by revelation. This may have been one of them. But it is not stated that they slept all the time they were with Christ in the Garden. The account rather implies men struggling to keep awake. Christ said of them that their spirit was willing. They may have heard the few words they record, though missing the remainder of what may have been, and probably was, a long prayer.

Reader, Yarmouth, Me. 1. In 1 Kings 6: 22, we read that Solomon's Temple was overlaid with gold. Also in 1 Kings 10: 14, it states that the gold that came to Solomon in one year was 666 talents—this would be equal to $17,610,811.46 in United States money. From whence came so much of the precious metal? If it all came from Ophir, why was there not more interest in mining there? Is any gold found there to-day? 2. If certain children inherit from their parents or ancestors certain sinful propensities, such as their appetite for strong drink, murderous covetousness, etc., are they responsible for their acts as children who do not inherit such proclivities, viewing the question from a Biblical or divine standpoint?

1. Within the last five years, explorers in Eastern Africa have discovered at Zimbabwe, near Mashonaland, a chain of great gold mines, that evidently have lain idle for many centuries. These are now believed by several authorities to have been the ancient Ophir of the Bible. The massive walls, towers of defence, and other buildings still standing, though more or less in ruins, show that the mines we worked by a much more civilized people th the surrounding native races. The report this discovery, delivered before the Geograp cal Society in London, showed that the mi (which still give evidence of richness) m have yielded gold in immense quantities. is, therefore, not improbable that they may reopened, as the work of civilizing Africa p gresses. 2. The influence of heredity and e vironment raises a question of individual sponsibility which theologians do not prete to solve. That vicious tendencies may be herited is undeniable, and the fact only g to prove our own responsibility for poster as well as for ourselves. We believe it w Emerson, who, being asked at what age would begin to correct the tendencies of child, replied: "About 250 years before it w born," meaning, of course, that if a virtu and upright ancestry could be assured, chances of the child's moral developm would be greatly improved. The childre the vicious, however, equally with those the upright, are in the hands of a just merciful Father, who will deal wisely by all, who knows the inheritance of infirmities w which some are unhappily afflicted.

Reader, Williamston, Mich. How were the m bers of the Sanhedrim chosen, and to how

The Great Sanhedrim, or Supreme Jew Council, or Court of Justice, civil and eccl astical, consisted of seventy-one members judges, representing three classes, viz: Priests, the Elders, and the Scribes. The c didate had to be a man of middle age, mor and physically blameless, learned in the l and able to speak several languages. Previ to being a candidate for the Great Sanhed he must have been a member of the Small S hedrim, a subordinate judicial body. The p er of ordaining new members and of elec officers in the Sanhedrim was vested in corporate assembly of members. The dura of membership is uncertain, but probably minated either with the first evidence of decay of intellectual and spiritual vigor with voluntary resignation.

Dumb Christian. I made a profession of faith Christ some years ago and know that I was cepted of him. Whenever I attempt to pra speak in public, it seems as if my mouth closed. Is it my duty to speak or pray in pu

Not necessarily. While there are many can both speak and pray acceptably in pu and who have the faculty of expressing th selves clearly even under deep emotion, th are others not so gifted, yet who may re equally efficient Christian service in o ways. (See I. Cor., 12 chap.) You may able to tell to one or two what you ca say to a hundred, and thus, by your con sation no less than your example, do good vice and give evidence of your own faith. if you will steadily persevere, and strive, Divine help, to overcome nervousness, or idity, or whatever may be the cause of hesitancy, you may eventually be enable speak with effect to the hearts of others.

Constant Reader, Scranton, Pa. Why do you answer questions in THE MAIL-BAG in the in which you receive them? A friend of sent a question which was answered in a weeks, while you have not yet answered that I sent before my friend wrote.

We have looked up your inquiry. It wa to where Cain found his wife. The only swer we could give to the question has given so many times that we are surp that one who calls himself a "Constant R er" did not see it. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

AN ARCTIC COMMEMORATION.

FIFTY years have passed since Sir John Franklin sailed, full of enthusiasm and ambition, on the voyage of discovery from which he never returned. The fiftieth anniversary of his departure was elebrated in England recently by surviv- g members of the explorer's family and by e Geographical Society. Three hundred stinguished personages made a pilgrimage the museum in which the relics of the ex- dition are preserved, a new wreath was ng over Franklin's portrait and a public eeting was held, at which the achieve- ents and high qualities of the explorer ere extolled. Our own land received its are of the glory; for it was to Lieut. chwatka, an American officer that Eng- nd owes the posses- on of the greater part the relics of the ex- dition, now treasur- l in the Franklin om of the Green- ich museum. His are in clearing up e mystery, which ad hung so long over e fate of the explor- s, was duly ack- owledged. It was a ystery that had qued the curiosity id aroused the sym- thy of a whole gen- ation. Franklin iled in 1845, and by e end of 1848, no dings having been ceived of him, there as general uneasi- ss and alarm for his fety. Three times fore, he had gone on ploring expeditions the Arctic, but nev- before had so long period elapsed before s return. His two ips, the "Erebus" d "Terror" had pro- sions for only three ars, so that there as ground for appre- ension. A relief par- was at once dis- tched and during the xt ten years no less an twenty-one expe- tions were sent out, t no trace of the ex- orers could be found, d some of the expe- tions had a narrow cape of disaster. The overnment would do more. It offered, however, a reward fifty thousand dollars to any one, who lved the mystery. But Lady Franklin uld not rest in ignorance of her husband's te. He might be living and in need of lp, though, as he would by that time seventy-three years of age, there was nall probability of that. Aided by gifts om her friends, she fitted out another ex- dition under Captain M'Clintock, which iled in 1859. This search was successful. paper was found buried in a cairn on ing William Island bearing the date of pril, 1848. It contained a record by Sir ohn Franklin, dated May 28, 1847, stat- g what had been accomplished in the two ears that had elapsed. Around the record, another hand, paper evidently having come scarce, was the statement, under ate of April 25, 1848, that Sir John had ed in June, 1847 and that nine officers and teen men were also dead and the ships d been abandoned. No further trace uld be found, and it was not until 1879 hen Schwatka made his search, that it as learned that the remainder of the arty, one hundred and five in number had erished afterward of scurvy and starva- on. The bones of the last survivors with number of instruments and utensils were ound under a boat. The tenderness and reverence with which Franklin's name and services were extolled at the celebration, proved that after fifty years his memory was still enshrined in the hearts of his countrymen. Nor is it likely that he will ever be forgotten. In sacrificing his life in the cause of science and exploration he gained an immortality of fame, which is never attained by those who live for themselves. Self-abnegation is the true way to immortality in every path and the humblest Christian who practises it has divine assurance that he will not miss the reward in its highest sense.

Whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the Gospel's shall keep it to life eternal. (Mark 8 : 35.)

The Tilted Ocean.

Confirmation of a new physical discovery comes from Holland. It was discovered some time ago that the axis of the earth, which had been supposed to be stationary, had a motion of its own. By careful calculation it was found that the imaginary line passing through the centre of the earth and terminating in the North and South Poles was affected by the rotation of the globe which at the equator attains the speed of about a thousand miles an hour. It was declared that the centre was stationary, but each pole traveled over a circle of at least ten yards in diameter and that it required fourteen months for the pole to go around the circle. It was at once perceived that if this was a fact, the water of the sea would be affected by the movement, as the water in a cup would be affected by tilting it from one side to the other. Inquiries were made to ascertain if an accurate record of the tides had been kept anywhere for a lengthy period. Such a record covering more than forty years was found at Helder in Holland, showing the regular height of the water in the canal at that place. An examination of the register reveals a regular periodicity exactly corresponding to the new idea of the motions of the earth's axis. The average height of the water in the canal showed a minute increase, day by day for seven months, followed by gradual decline for a corresponding period, and the level was exactly the same on any two days fourteen months apart. The discovery is interesting as showing how delicately the ponderous globe is poised, when the tipping so slightly of its gigantic axis as it rushes on its way through space, is responded to by the waters of the mighty ocean. It is customary to speak slightingly of the science of the Bible, but this recent discovery of science shows that the conception of creation formed by the Bible writers many centuries ago was not so erroneous as was supposed.

He maketh the sea like a pot of ointment. (Job 41:30.) He gave to the sea its bound when he marked out he foundations of the earth. (Prov. 8 : 29.)

A House Sold for $1.50.

One of the strangest auction sales of real estate took place in New York on June 6. Ninety-nine houses in one of the most densely populated districts of the city were sold for extraordinary low sums. The entire proceeds of the sale were less than eight hundred dollars. Several houses were sold for three dollars, and one for a dollar and a half. The district in which the houses stand is known as Mulberry Bend. It is inhabited almost exclusively by Italians, and the houses are filthy and dilapidated almost beyond belief. They are chiefly of brick and were in their early days the homes of decent people. In 1857 they had fallen into the possession of the disorderly element, and the district was the scene of an organized fight between the denizens of the Bend and the Bowery Boys, which was maintained for several days and was suppressed only when the militia were called out. After the war, the quarter was a favorite residence for negroes, and almost all the white people left it. The negroes were displaced in the course of years by the Italians, who now occupy it. With every change the buildings became dirtier and more degraded. Their condition finally became a menace to the health of the city and the Park Department determined to turn the district into a park. The houses were therefore sold at auction and the purchasers were required to tear them down within thirty days. That fact accounted for the low prices they brought. No one was disposed to set a high value on a house that could not be occupied or rented but must soon be torn down. It is a pity that men do not reason in the same way about their bodies. So high a value is often placed on the body that must soon be destroyed that the interests of the soul are sacrificed to provide it with gratification.

THE FRANKLIN JUBILEE—SIR JOHN AND LADY FRANKLIN—RELICS OF THE EXPEDITION.

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. Philip Phillips, "the Singing Pilgrim," was reported in a recent letter to be lying dangerously ill at Delaware, O.

There is Great Suffering Among the Coal miners at Clinton, Ind. The mines were shut down all winter, and now the operators have closed them until next fall. Hundreds of families are said to be destitute.

Mr. Loomis, who is Laboring in Japan, has notified the American Bible Society, that at a meeting of Japanese Christians recently held, it was decided to present a handsome copy of the Bible to the Emperor of Japan at an early date.

The Christian Workers' Association has Arranged to hold a convention at Silver Lake, N. Y., July 16-21. Another convention is to be held at New Haven, Conn., early in the fall, the date not yet fixed and the third at Augusta, Ga., in connection with the Southern Chautauqua. All information may be obtained by writing to Rev. John C. Collins, New Haven, Conn.

Evangelist Arthur Crane of Plainfield, N. J., is conducting union meetings at Wilmington, N. C. There are large congregations every evening and there have been many conversions. Early in July, Mr. Crane has promised to return to Missouri, where he recently held successful meetings in many cities. The work will begin at Clinton, where a special building is being erected to accommodate the union meetings and a large choir is being drilled.

The Church Missionary Society has just sent out a reinforcement of missionaries for Uganda, including the first body of ladies who have gone forth, one of whom is the daughter of the Dean of Armagh, and two are nurses.

An Alarming Dispatch from Shanghai, China, to the London "Daily Telegraph," states that the whole province of Canton is in a state of anarchy and that the American and English missionaries at Cheng Fu have been murdered.

Dr. R. S. MacArthur preached his last sermon before setting out on his foreign tour at Calvary Baptist Church on June 2. He sailed from San Francisco on June 15 for Hawaii, where he will stay a few weeks and then proceed to Japan. He expects to be in Japan until August, to study the country and the missionary work.

The National Temperance Society is making an effort to pay off its debt of ten thousand dollars, which has accumulated during the business depression. Mr. William D. Porter, the Treasurer, has issued an earnest appeal and states that he has received one liberal contribution from New Jersey toward that object.

The Latest Statistics of the Congregational Churches show 5,342 churches with 583,539 members, of whom 387,693 are women. The total additions were 62,846, of which 38,853 were on confession. The number of churches added to the roll was 215, leaving a net gain over the previous year of 111. There are 677,973 Sunday School scholars showing a gain of 30,979.

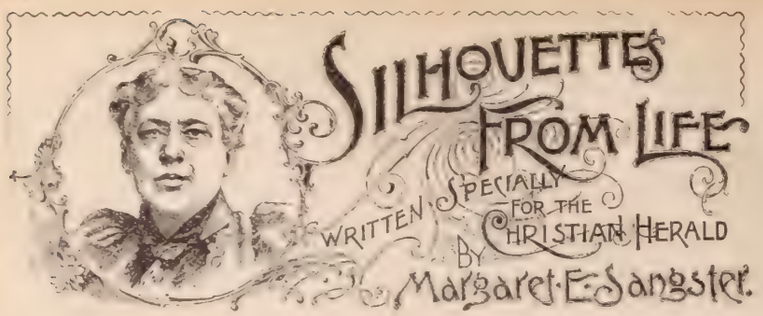
A Revival which Promises large permanent results has followed the labors of Rev. G. L. Barker, at Akron, O. All the churches in the town have felt the effect, not only in accessions, but in renewed life and activity among the worldly church members.

An English Journal Announces that Dr. T. J. Barnardo, the friend of the London street boys, is seriously ill, and has been ordered absolute cessation from work and change of scene. Dr. Barnardo has for more than twenty years devoted himself most energetically to the rescure of the children of the streets.

Major Cole's Work at Denison, Tex., Has stirred the whole city. Rev. W. S. Hills, Pastor of the First Congregational Church there, says: "Denison, to my knowledge, has never had anything that proved its equal in elevating the moral and religious tone of the entire city." The meetings have been especially successful in reaching the wealthier classes.

Mr. D. L. Moody Asks us to Announce That the World's Student Conference will be held in Northfield, Mass., June 28 to July 7. Among the speakers will be the Bishop of Vermont, Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, President Patton of Princeton, and President Stryker of Hamilton. The Y. M. C. A. Encampment July 9 to September 3. The Young Women's College Conference July 20-30, and the General Conference of Christian Workers Aug. 3-15. For further particulars, address Mr. A. G. Moody, East Northfield, Mass.

The American Sunday School Union has done an extensive work during the past year, in spite of the business depression. It has kept 140 men in the field, 1,763 new schools have been formed and 513 reorganized. These missionaries also made 107,230 visits, distributed thousands of Bibles and Testaments, and in 180 cases the organization of churches followed. We have received a special report from Rev. George W. Sharp, the missionary of the Union whose salary is paid by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and this we shall publish in an early issue.



A Trial of Faith.

"THE President of Deerham College is in need of a Secretary, who can also teach a class in English literature, and, so to speak, fill up chinks here and there. I know you are looking for a position, and I thought this might be just the one to suit you. At all events, dear Miss Evelyn, I have sent in your name and given you a good word. If you hear from Mrs. Elkins, the President referred to, remember that you have been recommended and endorsed by your former teacher and constant friend, who is, very affectionately yours, LUCY STANTON HOPE."

So ran a letter which Grace Evelyn read one sunny morning, when the bees were rioting over the clover, the honeysuckles sweetening the air, the birds lilting on bending boughs, the whole world rapturous with summer.

Grace was still young enough to be very much excited at the prospect of any decisive change. Herself a graduate, she had left school and college life a year ago, expecting to make a home of ideal sweetness for her widowed father, who had never so much as looked with ordinary attention at any woman, since, nine years before, the light of earth had faded from the blue eyes of his wife. But the unexpected is always happening, and Doctor Robert Evelyn was the latest proof of this old saw. Meeting on a visit to a friend in a distant city, a visit inspired by attendance at a great medical convention, a young lady of much beauty and rare endowments, he had suddenly fallen in love, and the fact that the girl was about Grace's age, led him, after the manner of men, to suppose that his daughter would be delighted to have so congenial a companion brought into the household.

Grace and Bessie, as the young wife insisted that her step-daughter should call her, got on together very well, superficially, but Grace was discontented, and Bessie aware of a very great relief when the former, to her father's manifest chagrin and annoyance, declared that she would go out into the world and earn a living for herself.

"At least," she said, "I will put to some honest use the talents I am endowed with, I cannot live in idleness, and I am not likely to be missed if I go at once."

An elderly friend, who shared her confidence, and approved her decision, advised her to let her desire be known at her old college, and among her former daily associates. The result was the letter quoted above, and this letter was one of the stepping stones which brought her in time to the place of general-assistant at Deerham.

She found herself nicely established there, with a very liberal salary.

Her duties she regarded as agreeable and not burdensome, but one of them proved difficult, and at first almost impossible.

Few women of this latter day, trained to religious exercises in public, have the very faintest conception of the shrinking felt a generation ago by those of their sex who prayed audibly before others. It was usual, and seemed the appropriate thing, indeed, for a woman's voice to become choked with sobs, and for her to lift a burning, trembling, tearful face from her hands after she had knelt in a woman's prayer-meeting.

Grace belonged to this period, and therefore it was a formidable thing she perceived [illegible] must sometime act as Chaplain.

If, for any reason, the Principal was detained at the beginning of meals, or could [illegible] by courtesy styled a college, it was really [illegible] opened by prayer in the morning, Miss Evelyn was expected to ask the blessing, or to lead in worship, as the occasion demanded.

The first time she had to do this, she faced the two long rows of critical girls with a feeling akin to desperation. It seemed a very simple thing to do, just to say a little word of prayer aloud to God, before people listening with bowed heads, but, if you never did it in your life, and if you are very timid by nature, it is more or less a hard task.

Grace waited, tried to speak; the sentence was drowned before it was born. A silence in which a pin might have been heard to drop, fell on the room, and one girl giggled.

Grace gave one swift mental appeal to God for help, then, calmly, in clear tones, asked the Divine blessing. A form would have been a crutch to lean upon, but Deerfield College was not ritualistic, and the grace was expected to be spontaneous.

"Make us thankful," said the low, steady voice, "for our daily bread, for all thy mercies, for thy ceaseless care and provision. Help us all this day to serve thee fully, for Christ's sake. Amen."

A few days passed, and it was Grace's duty to open the exercises by reading the Scriptures and offering prayer. She again suffered from nervous dread, again feared she would break down, again braced herself to the ordeal by the silent, inarticulate appeal to God.

Years after, when there was an alumnae dinner of the graduates of Deerfield, and the reunion had called together many of the dearly loved former teachers, Grace Evelyn, now married and stately and gracious in her rich womanhood, confessed in the presence of her old friends how great had been her terrors then.

"Yet," said one who was present, "I have since heard you address a large meeting of Chatauquans with perfect and unembarrassed ease, and I have heard you take part in great gatherings of King's Daughters, in a crowded church, and you showed no fear."

"Yes," replied Grace, "that is true; the first effort was my trial of faith. Had I discounted the help the dear Lord was ready to grant me then, I would never have been strong enough to do my duty. One learns by trying. Trust in God and go forward has been my motto since my youth, and from my youth up till now, God has not gone back on me."

A REGISTER OF SIN.

The Revelations of a Record of Vice Kept at the Varick Place, N.Y., Shelter for Homeless and Fallen Women.

ONE of the most distressing and saddening books in existence is the register at the Shelter at Varick Place, New York. This Shelter was established, as our readers will remember, by Jessie de Vie, who had herself been rescued from a dissolute life, and was anxious to rescue others. By the aid of her friends and the generous contributions of the readers of this journal, she furnished the Shelter, and received there women who professed a desire to turn from sin and seek pardon through Christ. She subsequently withdrew from the work, under the advice of a Christian friend, who urged her to enter a Bible school to get a better equipment for mission work. She was assured that her Shelter would be continued, and that there should be no relaxation of effort to rescue her fallen sisters. Miss Cooper and other devoted ladies have continued the work since Jessie's departure, spending freely their own means, and giving time and toil to the enterprise. Mrs. H. C. Morrell has now undertaken the charge of it, and proposes to give it all her time and energy.

From the beginning of the work, a systematic register of the inmates has been kept, and it is this book that tells so deplorable a story of wreck and ruin. It is probably worse than similar records in other institutions, because the Shelter was intended to be a kind of outpost in the conflict with sin—a kind of field-hospital for first help to the wounded from which, if recovery seemed probable, they would be sent to better equipped homes in the city or country.

The Shelter was located in one of the most notorious quarters of the city, where the women to whom it was intended to be a refuge were most numerous. Its design was to extend without restriction and without delay, or red-tape, a helping hand to any who might have even a spasmodic inclination to reform; it was to be a practical assurance that the path to restoration would not be impeded by unnecessary obstacles. Thus many entered who simply desired a week's quiet, or were temporarily disgusted with their lives, and knew that they could gain admission by professing a repentance that they did not feel. Others were received whom it was obviously better to place under more experienced Christian care, and their stay, too, in the Shelter was short, as they were transferred to other Homes. There has thus been a continuous stream of inmates for brief periods, and the register consequently contains an appalling record of moral leprosy.

In all, 515 cases are recorded, with the sickening details of each. The ages vary from fifty to fifteen, and the shameful experiences from twenty years to three months. There is a significance about the confessions that were made in answer to the question, "What led you into this sin?" An overwhelming majority attributed their fall to intoxicating liquor. Some had contracted the habit of drinking in the homes of their parents or husbands; others through the advice of medical men in times of sickness; and others through the invitations of persons professing friendship, who took the worst of all ways of showing friendship, that of offering intoxicating liquor. Some very sad cases there were, in which the answer was, "I had lost my husband," or "I had lost my father;" no friends, no money, no means of earning a living, homeless and starving. In such circumstances the tempter is apt to find but feeble resistance. Had some kindly, honest hand been held out to them in that hour of trial, they might not have fallen. Perhaps as we get better civilized and more intelligently apprehend the principles of Christ, we may adopt some means of meeting such emergencies and so proving that prevention is better than cure.

There are other details, too, which show how a citadel that has once fallen becomes the prey of evils of many kinds. One inmate could not remember how many times she had been in prison, but certainly a hundred, others confessed to twenty or thirty terms on the island. "Drunk and disorderly was generally the crime and occasionally the charge was assault. Cigarette-smoking, the opium habit and other debauching, degrading vices almost completed the terrible record. But not quite. There is one class of entries that offsets these and that is the records of reclamation. Few as these are, compared with the whole number, there are enough to encourage the workers to go on. What is one soul worth? It is certain that some have been reformed and are living decent, reputable lives. So let none say the work does not pay.

It is gratifying to learn that in the basement of the Shelter, services are now held in the evening, and many of the passers-by of the class the Shelter is trying to reach, enter attracted by the music and singing. Gospel invitations are given and if the hearers go away unmoved at the time, the memory of what they have heard may recur to them at some future time and bear fruit. Arrangements have also been made to increase the number of beds, so that homeless women who are not vicious may be accommodated for the night on the payment of a small sum. Tickets have been printed which may be purchased at the Shelter, and one of these given to a homeless woman will entitle her to a bed and a meal. Seven of these tickets will keep her there a week.

During the past six weeks 456 such lodgings have been provided. Of these, 124 were paid for at the fifteen cent rate and the other 332 were provided without payment. An effort is being made to render the mission self-supporting by this means and by sewing, washing, etc.

OUR CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

III.—MR. C. C. LEWIS.

AN extraordinary work has been carried on during the past eleven years at Chattanooga, Tenn., by the wonderful man whose picture appears in this column. Wholly without means and while he and his devoted wife worked for their daily bread, Mr. Lewis has labored incessantly for the conversion of drunkards, fallen women and all the most hopeless cases that could be found in the city. He commenced the work under a deep sense of his obligation to Christ in his own salvation. He had himself been a hopeless case. In 1871, when he was seventeen years of age, and living at Dayton, O., he was expelled from college for drunkenness. For eight years his pious parents and friends grieved over him as one utterly irredeemable, a confirmed drunkard, gambler and reprobate. In 1879, he married and for a time there was a change for the better. There were lapses into the old ways until October, 1884, when, yielding to the pleadings of his wife, he attended a revival meeting, was converted and united with the Presbyterian Church.

MR. C. C. LEWIS OF CHATTANOOGA.

He was living at that time in Chattanooga and he commenced work for Christ immediately. The story of his labors, supplied to us by his friend, Mr. S. H. Ferguson, is a marvellous record of success and effort. He went down into the slums and securing the use of an old shanty by the riverside in the lumber district, gathered in all the dissolute people he could find, told them what Christ had done for his soul and what he could do for others. He often talked and pleaded with his hearers for hours and when one or more showed an inclination to accept salvation he would stay till after midnight making the way plain to them. It was a personal testimony with him and it had power.

Finding an abandoned building near the Wasson Car-works he began meeting there, aided by some of his converts from the old shanty by the river and a wonderful work of grace resulted. A meeting was afterward begun at the East Tennessee Road Shops, where some notable conversions took place. Several other places in various parts of the city were occupied. Mr. Lewis was busy somewhere every night from dusk until the small hours. His lack of funds compelled him to occupy only such places as could be had for nothing or at a very nominal rental. One of his most successful missions was conducted in a cellar at the corner of Broad and Fourth streets, which was called "The Beaver Slide." There three hundred of the lowest outcasts of the city were brought in and a great work was done. No less than five hundred conversions are believed to have occurred in the old cellar and the work is still going on. Mr. Lewis is now laid aside by illness, but the outcasts whom he saved are keeping the meetings alive. A generous friend who knew of his good work not long ago presented him with a horse that he might go from one mission to another without the fatigue of walking. He and the horse are a familiar sight to the people of the city, for there is now a range of missions in various sections which before his illness he visited every night.

A CHILDREN'S PARADISE.

Views of The Christian Herald Children's Home, at Mont-Lawn, Nyack, N. Y.

"Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto Me." Matt. 26 : 45.

THERE is no pleasure in this world of ours so pure and innocent as that of a little child, no laughter so sweet as that of children, no picture so sad as that of a joyless childhood. In all our great cities, and especially in New York, there are thousands upon thousands of little ones whose early years are passed amid surroundings so miserable, unwholesome, and vicious as to augur ominously for their future. Many have never seen a Sabbath School, and do not know the name of Jesus, except when they hear it uttered in profanity. Some never even saw a blade of grass or pulled a flower. Seen for the first time, a wood to them is a wonderland ; a smooth lawn, a drum of delight. That this is no overdrawn picture, hundreds of godly men and women in New York, who take a deep interest in the redemption and welfare of the children of the slums, can testify.

It was of such as these that the poetess, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, wrote:

"The young, young children, O my brothers,
They are weeping bitter tears ;
They are weeping in the playtime
Of the others.
Not their sorrow comes
With years.

Last summer, the Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD availed himself of a long-desired opportunity to put into practical operation an experiment in behalf of these neglected children, which promised to produce salutary results, morally and physically, besides affording the little ones such a pleasure as they had never before enjoyed. The beautiful property of Mont-Lawn on the banks of the Hudson River, about an hour's ride by rail from New York, was secured, and, after due preparation, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home was opened. Mont-Lawn soon became very dear to many hundreds of the poor little tenement waifs, nearly 1,200 children being therein sheltered and cared for there during the summer season of 1894. The delightfully situated grounds consist of many acres of farm, woodland and sunny slopes, and include two attractive and commodious cottages, a spacious lodge, a charming chapel and a generous barn, all placed at the disposal of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home by Rev. A. D. Lawrence Jarrett, D. D., of Washington, D. C., at the nominal consideration of one dollar a month. In the larger of the two cottages—which is the Home proper—the hall is attractively fitted up as a reception room. On the right is a well-furnished reception room, and on the left a well-ventilated and cheerful dormitory for the children. Back of it is the dining-room, with kitchen and laundry conveniently located alongside. Upstairs are seven rooms and bath-rooms ; the former are used as additional dormitories. The ground floor of the Lodge is used as sleeping quarters for the help and a playroom for stormy weather, while the second story affords thirty little boys opportunity to sleep on comfortable cots between snowy sheets and downy quilts.

Our children are conveyed to the home in parties of about twenty-five. New contingents daily arrive every evening for a ten day's stay at Mont-Lawn, and twenty-five others whose vacation has expired are every morning returned to their homes in the city. The capacity of the Children's Home has been increased this year to accommodate two hundred and fifty little guests simultaneously, instead of 140, as last year. This has been done by the addition of a second building larger than either of those already described. In many ways the general facilities have been improved and our young guests, who have already begun their summer sojourn with us, find Mont-Lawn, if possible, prettier, nicer and even more of a Children's Paradise than ever. At the Home, the stay of the children is made a pleasant one. One missionary is detailed to wait upon and care for every fifteen children. While the strictest discipline is maintained, no effort is spared to make the place as like a real home as possible, and to remove the idea of an institution.

On the Beautiful Lawn, which is the playground for our little folks, there is ample opportunity for the indulgence of innocent frolic. Each day brings new faces to the Children's Home and takes away those whose holiday term of ten days has expired. It is a shifting panorama of child-life, bright, cheerful and instructive. To the happy juveniles who go there it is like a section of heaven let down for their delight, a vacation among kind friends, to be remembered through the after years.

Hardly has the morning sun lighted up the valley below Mont-Lawn when the children are up and the whole of the little community is astir. Our children assemble at the sound of the drum to march in columns, like little veterans, to the great dining-hall, where they sit down to meals with hearty appetites, rendered keen by the air of the hills. As their leader gives the signal, the childish feet move together and all are soon in their seats at the well-appointed table and ready for morning grace. Toward evening, before going down to supper, the little ones gather on the lawn to the sound of the drum. At the summons, the whole troop of boys boys and girls form a great circle around the flag-pole, and there, with eyes dancing with excitement and lungs filled with the pure ozone of the hills, they sing several patriotic songs—songs which every American boy and girl ought to know. These songs are printed for our children in a leaflet in the American colors—red, white and blue—and those who prove the cleverest in memorizing them accurately receive a reward. Many have learned the words of the entire series from beginning to end. When a boy or girl succeeds in committing one of these songs to memory, the opportunity is afforded of reciting it under the flagstaff or singing it as a solo with the whole circle swelling the chorus.

Time passes quickly and merrily at Mont-Lawn and our children think the days are all too short. Their only regret is that they cannot be prolonged so that their ten days of frolic and freedom might last the whole summer through.

The golden summer days are all too brief, although our children industriously continue to pack into each circuit of the old-fashioned clock on Matron Herr's mantel, all the enjoyment the country can possibly hold. In these mid-summer days, the country is at its best, and each successive party of little city waifs, during their sojourn at the Home, extract more real, healthful pleasure from wood and field than they ever dreamed of before. Full to its capacity, the Home is never uncomfortably crowded. With every child there are two notable days there ; one, the day of arrival, the other that of departure. They become so attached to the place that when they are about to leave it, their childish sorrow finds expression in tears and sobs. Their young hearts are full of gratitude for the "good times" they have had and they are not slow to express it in their own simple way.

This lesson of gratitude and helpfulness is always implanted ere the children leave us. Every boy and girl—from the toddler to the twelve-year old—is pledged to do as much as it can for some other child when the chance offers itself. And we believe that most of them will loyally keep their word. Thus every one of our children, after a vacation at Mont-Lawn, becomes in turn a tiny evangel of joy and goodness to others.

RALLYING ROUND THE FLAG AT "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" CHILDREN'S HOME, MONT-LAWN, NYACK, N. Y.

A SHADY NOOK AT THE GATEWAY.

ONE OF THE DORMITORIES AT THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

THE Entrance to Mont-Lawn is by a charmingly-picturesque gateway, beside the Boys' Lodge, and up a shady avenue that looks, oh, so cool and inviting in the summer time! In front of the big cottage is a great, spreading lawn, with a Liberty pole in the centre, from which proudly floats the glorious Stars and Stripes, visible from the opposite bank of the majestic Hudson as far south as Washington Irving's Home at Sunnyside, and north as far as Sing Sing. On this lawn, now blooming with daisies and ankle-deep with fragrant clover-grass, our children have their sports. It is a pleasant sight to see them gather there in little groups, when they know the wagon is coming up the road with a fresh lot of new companions for them, right from the city. And such merry greetings as they give to the newcomers, cheer after cheer echoing and re-echoing, after which they show them all over the place, presently getting as well acquainted as though they had known each other all their little lives. These typical children of the streets, some of whose wee feet had never pressed the grass, and to whose [illegible] of trees or flowers had been those stunted specimens seen in the parks of the city, on reaching the country, fall at once into nature's mood, and are as happy as [illegible].

Not all come well supplied with garments, [illegible] children coming the homes of the very poor. In many instances, we have to fit the little ones out with necessary clothing and shoes, so that they may spend their vacation in comfort. None are sent home in a ragged condition; if the clothing is dilapidated and the shoes worn out, before the child is put aboard the steamer "Chrystenah" for the return trip, it is fitted up with such articles as may be needed.

How are they brought to Mont-Lawn? you ask. Well, the children who are selected to be our guests are marshaled at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House, whither they come from back lanes, dingy alleys, and close tenements, in charge of city mission workers or Sunday School teachers. Then comes the ordeal of "passing the doctor," for care must be taken that no one is admitted who is afflicted with an infectious or contagious disease of the skin, the eyes, or the body generally. Each relay or detachment of children is assembled in room 99 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices, and, one by one, examined by a competent physician. Each child is then supplied with a canvas bag, in which to put its parcel of belongings brought for the ten days' outing. These bags serve a double purpose, being more convenient to carry their parcels, which are liable to come loose or get lost, and serving also to identify the children, in the event of any of them straying from the main party—each bag being clearly marked on the outside with the address: "Christian Herald Children's Home, Nyack, N.Y." Those who have satisfactorily passed the examination are conveyed to the pier at the foot of West Tenth street, North River, and there transferred to the steamer "Chrystenah" for a pleasant sail up the Hudson to their destination, the entire party being in charge of missionaries connected with the staff at the Home. Starting at 4 o'clock P. M., they reach Nyack at half-past 5, where the wagonette is in waiting. All arrive at Mont-Lawn a little before 6, and just in time for supper.

Our Children's Wagonette, which performs the journey daily from the Home to the Nyack dock and back, is a roomy, comfortable vehicle, donated to the Home by Dr. L. Klopsch, for the use of the children. Many jolly rides and excursions are planned for the little folks, and in all of these the Wagonette is a favorite adjunct. The ride from the steamer wharf to Mont-Lawn is a merry one throughout. When all are comfortably settled in the Wagonette, with a crack of the whip, the drive is begun through a most beautiful country. On the way they point out to each other in admiring surprise the grassy fields, the hedges, and the wild flowers. They can hardly be restrained. It is a new wonderland such as many had never seen before. A few plead with the driver to stop, that they may descend from the Wagonette. When they clamber into their seats again, their arms are full of daisies and buttercups. They are enchanted with everything they see and hear, for their little lives have been passed amid the tall tenements and streets, innocent of a particle of verdure. The singing of the birds overhead awakes the music in their own hearts, and soon the Wagonette, like a happy chariot, is a burst of joyous song. The carol of their childish voices floats over the fields and hedges and across the daisied meadows, and presently it reaches the ears of our other little guests, who at that hour are generally playing on the lawn, and they quickly assemble to give the new-comers a right royal welcome.

All the Dormitories are as neat as wax, and seem as if made to woo the little ones to slumber. Retiring bell rings at 8 P. M., and soon each of the trim iron [illegible]s, with snowy spreads and nice surround[illegible]s, has its occupant. The boys' and [illegible]'s dormitories are in different parts of [illegible]e Home, but all are exactly alike. Each [illegible]ild has an individual towel and wash-rag [illegible]an arrangement not to be found in any [illegible]er institution for children, and which a[illegible]kens in the little ones a sense of the in[illegible]idual responsibilities for their persona[illegible]ppearance.

Many of the girls, when they arriv[illegible] receive a well-made and well-fitting gin[illegible]am dress, which they wear while roa[illegible]ng around, and thus save their own clo[illegible]ng for their return home. Of course it i[illegible]tional with them to wear their own ar[illegible]ments or this more substantial and se[illegible]ceable frock. Each child stows away it[illegible]ew belo[illegible]gs in a [illegible]at little l[illegible]er, every l[illegible]ker bearing [illegible]abel wit[illegible]the name [illegible]f the little g[illegible]s who is use[illegible] it. If an[illegible]one were to [illegible]sit these [illegible]mi[illegible]tories [illegible]ter 8.30, P.[illegible] he would see rows o[illegible]ve[illegible] heads, [illegible]ark brown [illegible]d golden, est[illegible]ing cal[illegible]m on the s[illegible]f, white p[illegible]lows, e[illegible] shut a[illegible] fast [illegible]ep. There [illegible] disorde[illegible] and perfect [illegible]at-ness [illegible]s all the [illegible]range[illegible]nts. The [illegible]ittle bund[illegible] clothin[illegible]s all ne[illegible]tly folde[illegible] and laid [illegible] side in ad[illegible]ness f[illegible]r the risin[illegible]g. Ever[illegible] towels and wash-rags are in their [illegible] places, for the toilet comes first [illegible] morning, and there is nothing like [illegible] toilet to put the children in trim [illegible] march across the way to breakfas[illegible]

It is not surprising that our [illegible]dre[illegible] should fall in love with the pretty, [illegible]white painted iron bedsteads and the snow[illegible]y coverings. One of their saddest pa[illegible]gs when their ten days' vacation is ove[illegible]s to bid good-bye to the dainty, cool litt[illegible]beds that have afforded them such sweet, [illegible]an[illegible]less slumber, and to go back to th[illegible]he and unwholesome sleeping-places [illegible]the stifling tenements of a great city.

THE Pretty Dining-hall is full of sunshine and cheer, as a dining-hall should be. The fun, the exercise, free mountain air and the aromatic odors the pines and maples summon the roses the cheeks of our children, bring a sparkle the eyes, and give them most famous appetites that do justice to the nourishing fare before them during their sojourn at Mont-Lawn. All the cooking is done in large kitchen, which is provided with a plentiful supply of pure spring water. The usual routine of the Home is: Rising at seven o'clock; then, after toilet breakfast, followed by a brief service in the chapel. At the morning meal there is an abundance of fresh milk, wheaten grits, oatmeal hominy, sweet wholesome bread and butter, fruit, and occasionally fresh country eggs. Service is followed by a forenoon of frolic and romp in the open air, or perhaps an excursion to the woods in search of pretty wild flowers. Then dinner is served at noon and consists of meat, potatoes, sweet corn or other seasonable vegetables, pie or pudding and bread. At every meal a blessing is asked in song. Then our little ones divide into groups and sit around the piazzas or on the cool, shady lawn, chatting with each other or listening wonderingly to the drowsy, mingled hum of bird, bee and insect life that fills the summer air. In the afternoon there is usually a ride and other attractions for the youngsters, such as swings, quoits, croquet, baseball, etc. They are never allowed to feel time hanging heavy on their hands.

Nobody is idle at the Home unless sick, and as there are no idlers it follows that all are busy. Every day some of the children are busy at the appointed tasks of helpfulness, such as housecleaning, mending, etc., and every evening child anxious be used and to something to "keep use." Some are used to certain enjoyments, keeping hours, assisting mothers or helping the table, etc., and these happy times are full of bustle and self-importance. There is nothing a girl loves more than to be entrusted with some responsibility by the superintendent, and the little women go about their dainty tasks like real housewives, with proud, satisfied faces, that tell of their pleasure in being permitted to "help out."

Supper is served at six o'clock. When it is over the young voices all unite in repeating a brief prayer, which is followed by the Lord's Prayer and a rousing song service, an ever popular feature of which is the evening hymn:

Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me.
Bless thy little lamb to-night:
Through the darkness be thou near me,
Watch my sleep till morning light.

For a little while after supper our children are let loose for a finishing romp before retiring.

A lady, who has taken a deep interest in the children at Mont-Lawn, has written these verses for our little ones, to be sung to the tune of "Greenland's Icy Mountains":

We thank thee, Heavenly Father,
For this dear Summer Home.
Its teachings and its pleasures,
Will go where e'er we roam.
We never will forget Thee:
But strive to do Thy will,
And what our teachers tell us
We will remember still.

We ask Thee to forgive us,
For what we've done that's wrong;
We want to be true Christians,
Sweet, patient, brave and strong.
We want to be like Jesus
Whom children loved to see;
For He, the Lord of Glory,
Said: "Let them come to Me."

The Children's Bathing Hour is hailed with real delight by our little folks at Mont-Lawn. As everybody knows, boys and girls, whether raised in town or country, dearly love a frolic in the water. The Nyack Country Club has kindly placed its bathing facilities on the historic Hudson River at the service of the Children's Home during the summer. It is a perfectly safe bathing-place, and the youngsters are always surrounded by proper precautions and in the care of adults who are able to look after them when bathing time comes around. The boys take their dip in the forenoon and the girls in the afternoon, and such frolics as they enjoy in the water, romping, laughing, splashing and racing! Our photograph gives but a faint idea of the fun they sometimes have during the bathing hour. Bathing dresses are supplied and the picture presented by these little ones as they gambol about in the clear, shallow water is one an artist would love to paint.

"THE BATHING HOUR" AT THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

After their bath, our youngsters are as spry as kittens and cut up all sorts of antics indoors and out. The boys, to keep them out of mischief, have been organized into two baseball nines and with the tiniest of bats and balls that are safe to handle, they play against each other and mark up their score like regular veterans. The girls like to go driving or to play about on the lawn, or go flower-picking on the hillside.

But our children carry zest into their amusements, whether they are carriage-riding, nutting, gathering wild-flowers in the woods or playing leap-frog or ring-a-rosy on the spacious lawn in front of the House. There is room for a regiment on that lawn, and it's a sight worth going many a mile to see, when our little men and women—no longer pale and wan from their life in the close tenements, but bronzed with the sunshine and the mountain air—swarm across it in merry rout and waken the echoes in the Mont-Lawn woods. Yet all are remarkably behaved and yield ready obedience to the mild and salutary discipline of the Children's Home.

THE DINNER HOUR AT THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

Already our little people at Mont-Lawn, like other American children, are beginning to look forward with gleeful anticipations to the coming Fourth of July, which is a red-letter day at the Home. Some of them have a vivid recollection of the last "Fourth" at Mont-Lawn and the delights it brought to our guests. In the afternoon of the eventful day there will be a special treat of ice cream and cake for the children. In the evening the front of the Home will be alight with Chinese lanterns, and there will be a brilliant pyrotechnic show of red, blue and green lights, wheels, roman candles and sky-rockets, illuminating the hillside, the valley below, and lighting up the Hudson for many miles.

THE Pretty Little Chapel is one of the pleasantest features of Mont-Lawn. On Sunday, with the earliest tinkle of the rising-bell at seven, the white-draped cots in the dormitories are vacated, and the little folks begin to dress for a breakfast of eggs, cocoa, bread and milk, and berries, which is ready at eight. At nine they are summoned to morning prayers, after which the missionaries instruct them in the Sunday School lesson.

third, both of which nearly all the children know by heart. Then, after a little more music, one of the missionaries leads in prayer, and this is followed by the Lord's Prayer, all joining in the petition. For the next five minutes the order of exercises is relaxed and the children are at liberty to choose any hymn they please. They then march out again to their favorite chorus:

Follow! follow! I will follow Jesus;
Everywhere He leads me, I will follow on.

find. For even city children can be "tired out," and so it happens that having exhausted all the attractions of base ball, croquet, quoits, swings, hide-and-seek, and such like games outdoors, they are glad to seek rest recreation simultaneously in the play-room. Here are checker-boards, dominoes, tiddle-de-winks, back-gammon, jack-straws, picture-books, scrap-books, block letters, and pictures, blackboads for original drawings; and such drawings as one some-other pleasures provided for their amusement in the evening hours, after the Song Service and before retiring, is the wonderful Edison Phonograph, which discourses the most delightful a vocal and instrumental. And thus, every h has winged feet at Mont-Lawn!

Who shall say that the memory of the short, sweet, sunny days restful nights may not prod an impression in the lives our dear, little lambs that help them hereafter? No k ness, however small, is don vain, and the seeds droppe the young hearts at M Lawn may bear fruit in years to come.

The total cost of one ch outing at the Children's H including fares, is only t dollars. There are many, very many, whose tender lives would be lengthened their future brightened by an experience. Dear rea have you a nook in your h for these neglected and l less waifs? If so, you can come the gracious benefact at least one little boy or girl is summer. But the smalles fering will be welcomed, as gratefully as the lar and all such contributions be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Those friends who aide Children's Home last se and enabled it to open its pitable doors to a l larger number of little gu than it could otherwise done, have our warmest gratitude. trust that their number will be incre this summer, so that the Home may be to extend its welcome to other hundre

SUNDAY SCHOOL EXERCISES IN THE CHAPEL OF THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

After dinner comes the event of the day. For the time being, the little chapel is transformed into a Sunday School, where our children gather in the afternoon and join their sweet voices in the hymn-singing, the music being led by a small but powerful organ. They also take a hearty part in the simple Bible exercises which Dr. Klopsch has arranged specially for their benefit. Many of the answers prove the children to be wonderfully bright. There are usually about 200 at these Sunday School gatherings.

An afternoon of quiet, restful cessation from all play is followed by an early tea, and then comes the Sunday evening Service of Song. There are few things in which the average child takes more pleasure than in vocal music. Visitors to the Home have been delighted at this evening Service of Song (held daily at 7 o'clock in the chapel), by observing the heartiness with which our little folks melodiously carry hymn after hymn, in perfect time. They are furnished with leaflets, printed specially for their use, and containing the words of a number of familiar hymns, such as, "Jesus Loves Me," "Come to the Saviour," "While the Days are Going By," "Rock of Ages," "Jesus Lover of My Soul," "Yield not to Temptation," "When He Cometh," etc. All of these and many other hymns they sing with a vigor and earnestness that show how thorough is their enjoyment of the pleasure. Indeed, next to their play, there is nothing they seem to love so much as these musical hours.

After the singing they unite in reciting a familiar Psalm, preferably the first or twenty-

Indoor Games for Wet Days are provided for our little guests, for they must never find the hours lagging at Mont-Lawn, no matter how stormy the weather. A great and popular resort is the play-room (which is shown in our photograph). Here the children gather whenever they have had enough out-door sport, and a merrier, yet better-behaved crowd it would be hard to times sees there! Besides these, there are mottoes and a variety of other amusements to pass the time pleasantly. All the boys and girls love the play-room. It is the main apartment of the quaint cottage, known as "The Boys' Lodge," which stands at the entrance to Mont-Lawn, right opposite the chapel, and about thirty yards distant from the main building. ENGLISH RAGGED SCHOOLS.

Many Thousands of Waifs Sheltered in Them Yearly—Their Rapid Growth.

AMERICANS who visit the by-streets and ways of London at the present time, gain a very poor idea of the street-rovers and urchins of the days before ragged schools were established. The nickname "Ragged School" was given to the first experiment of teaching the street-rovers of Field Lane in a report printed in the London Times. When an effort was made to interest the English Parliament in the movement it encountered a full tide of opposition and ridicule. The government was very slow to perceive that it had any obligation to help such of its subjects as could not help themselves to a rudimentary education but the earnest and dogged energy of a few noble men prevailed. Thousands of young outcasts were reclaimed; great numbers were aided to emigrate to the colonies of America, and the government finally recognized the importance of caring for the poor, to keep them from vice and crime. Out of this seed has come the government school system of Great Britain, which now brings education fairly within the reach of all.

The literature of these schools is interesting. Among the earliest writers for them was "Old Humphrey," very popular half a century ago, and later Rob Roy (John Macgregor) was an enthusiast for ragged schools. He contributed largely to the solution of the problem of employment for the boys by establishing the Boys' Shoeblack Brigades, that earned about $5,000 a month in the London streets.

Lord Shaftesbury used to claim that about 300,000 young persons had been saved from sinking into crime by the Ragged School movement. Now the Union finds that the public government schools educate the poor. So it has turned its attention to the support of Sunday Schools and Bible classes, maintaining about two hundred schools with about 50,000 young people in them. It has institute buildings with gymnasium, technical and industrial classes during the week. It establishes penny savings banks, and in other ways fosters habits of industry and thrift.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYER.

At the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on June 9, in accordance with the request of the following persons, who also ask the prayers of our readers:

For Special Blessings: "Believer in Prayer," Lexington, Neb., that God would mercifully send rain on the drouth-stricken district that the crops, for which there is bitter need, might be saved.——"Distressed Husband," Brooklyn, N. Y., that God would direct him where to find his wife who has left her home and her little children, and cannot be found.——"Widow," Melrose, Mass., that a good Christian might be delivered from financial distress and enabled to pay his debts in full.——"Homeless One," that a home may be found for one who was turned out of home by persons who have made many professions of friendship in the past.——M. E. F., Litchfield, Neb., that God would send rain on the land which is drier this year than it was last year. "Pray as Elijah prayed, we beg of you."——"Reader," Fairmont, for wisdom and grace to lead to Christ a dear friend who is near death and cannot find God.——J. R. M., Wales, Ont., whose way is very dark and who has not the consolation of the Gospel.——"Sister in Christ," Florida, that God would help her husband now in a business trouble.

For the Conversion of Relatives or Friends: M. A. D., Island, Vt., for a young man who has fallen, after a long period of clean living, that God would restore the backslider.——"Anxious Mother," Rudolph, O., for the conversion of husband and children.——"A Mother," Plummers, Ky., for the conversion of an afflicted and unregenerate son, and of his brothers and sisters.——"Interested Believer," Westbury, Mass., for three young men in the Sunday School who have not yet come out boldly on the Lord's side.——"Subscriber," Mobile, Ala. asks prayer for two brothers, one of whom has embraced the faith.——"One who Suffers," Long Branch, N. J., desires prayers for her brothers' conversion, and the preservation of her sister in circumstances of severe temptation.——"Reader," Cayuga, Ont., for two friends, one of whom is liable to fall under the power of strong drink.——"Mother," Sunbury, Pa., for an only son, a victim of intemperance.——A. J. G., Ruffin, N. C., whose only child, a brother, and a nephew are all out of Christ's fold.——"A Reader," Tazewell Co., Ill., for the conversion of father and mother.——"Aged Mother," S. C., for the conversion of a daughter whose ungovernable temper is making home miserable.——K. S. J., Richmond, Va., for husband and his friends who are in urgent need of grace.——M. A. K., Mt. Clare, W. Va., on behalf of a young man who had once made profession of Christ, but has fallen away.——"Sister in Christ," Litchfield, Neb., that at the coming camp-meeting the Holy Spirit may touch her husband's heart.——U. S. H., Oregon, on behalf of her husband, who is good in every way, but not a Christian.——V., Newnam, Ga., that a motherless boy may shun wicked men and be led to Christ.

For the Restoration of Health. W. E. P., Brentcreek, Mich., a sufferer for four years past, who believes in Christ's power.——"In His Name," Williamsfield, O., who is suffering severe pain and is losing faith in God's love.——"Sister in Christ," Palatka, Fla., on behalf of a dear friend who has not walked for six years.——"Reader, Princeton, N. C. For the recovery of an aged father who has suffered for many years.——"Reader," Superior, Wis., for recovery from a severe malady.

From Faithful Worker, Mass. That God would furnish the means for more extended work for him.

From Subscriber, Utica, N. Y. For the conversion of an only brother.

From A Mother, Washington, D. C. That her son may be reclaimed from drink

From Reader, Saco Me. For the conversion of a son, the child of many prayers that he may turn to God.

From Reader, Baltimore, Md., that God would give her the grace of repentance and bring her to himself. Also for a friend that he may live a holier life and be helped to forgive those who have injured him.

From a Mother, Indiana. For the conversion of her four children, one of whom has become a drunkard and a gambler.

From a Mother, Hill City, Tenn. For the conversion of her only boy, once a member of the church, but now a worldling.

From "In Faith," Erie, Pa., one who is in deep heart trouble for forgiveness and strength to do right under trying circumstances. Also for another who, though knowing he has done wrong, is not concerned about it, that he may be convicted of sin and converted.

From Anxious Husband, Brooklyn, N. Y. That his wife, whose evil course is breaking his heart, may be led to quit the company of evil persons and turn to God.

From the following persons for restoration to health: H. M. S., Byfield, Mass.; D. McK., Groton, S. D. W. B. S., Chattanooga, Tenn., for the recovery of a Christian worker; T. H., Danville, Ill.; L. C. B., Beeville, Tex., for the recovery of a sick brother; "Shut-in," Newark, N. J.: M. E. D., Thompson, Mich.

From A Mother, Philadelphia, for the reclamation of her son, who is an habitual drunkard, and for the conversion of her ungodly husband.

From A Sunday School Superintendent in Oregon, for God to take away his timidity and help him to carry on his work for Christ successfully.

CONSOLATION.

THOU art my Refuge—to thine arms
I run for succor, sore distressed;
There, safe from all the world's alarms,
Thou givest rest.

Thou art my Rock—when billows roll
Thy power can bid my terrors cease;
And 'mid the storm, unto my soul
Thou givest peace.

Thou art my Star—I scarce can see
The way, so dark and wild the night;
Yet, when I cry far off to Thee,
Thou givest light.

Thou art my hope—when tired, undone
I shrink before the road's dull length;
Then to Thy weary, wandering one
Thou givest strength.

Thou art mine All—sore, worn and sad,
I lift my lonely heart above;
Then for the joys which once I had Thou givest love.

APOCALYPTIC FIGURES.

The Imagery of the Book of Revelation Typical of Events in Earth and Sky at the Close of the Dispensation.

BY WILLIAM MAUDE.

IN striking contrast to the figure of the lonely eagle already mentioned, is the appalling vision, in the ninth chapter, of Revelation of vast swarms of gigantic locust-like forms ascending from the opened mouth of the abyss, amid clouds of lurid smoke which darken the very heavens, and cover the earth with their countless hosts!

Each of these monstrous creatures, separately considered, is an image of terror, in its unearthly combination of attributes, but in their overwhelming aggregation they present to the mind's eye a spectacle of infranatural power to which few parallels can be found.

Lastly—for we may not linger in this wondrous picture gallery—we have in the crowning vision of the New Jerusalem descending from heaven, a city glorious "as a bride adorned for her husband," with its walls of jasper, its gates of pearl, its streets of gold, and its foundations of precious stones, a complex symbolism, a revelation of glory and of joy, which has touched the heart and fired the imagination of humanity as no other revelation ever did. Whether we regard it as a literal reality or as a wondrous piece of symbolism, it stands alone in its altitude of peerless beauty, as a realisation of the saints' everlasting home. Its glory has shone through the tears and assuaged the sorrows of saints and martyrs, the persecuted and afflicted, in all ages of the Church's history.

But my object is not to enlarge upon the wonderful character of the Apocalyptic imagery in general, but rather to draw attention to the fact, that the whole action of the Apocalyptic drama is, so to speak, played out on a stage which has a permanent background, the relation of which to the occurrences described, it is necessary to realize if we would not miss much of the impressiveness and something of the meaning of the latter. This permanent background—the scenery, if a histrionic allusion may be permitted—which remains unchanged up to a point presently to be indicated, is the great vision of the throne, the elders and the living creatures, recorded in the fourth chapter, from the second to the eleventh verses.

These verses describe the scene John beheld when he had obeyed the summons, "Come up hither, and I will show thee the things which must come to pass hereafter." Put into other words, and endeavoring to indicate more clearly the relation in which the various objects which it includes stood to one another. It may be thus described: The central and most prominent feature in the whole scene, and that which it would seem first arrested the seer's attention, was a throne: "the throne of the majesty in the heavens," spoken of in the Epistle to the Hebrews; and though neither its form nor appearance is described, it was doubtless "high and lifted up," like that which Isaiah saw in the corresponding theophany which he describes (Isa. 6: 1-4.) Upon this throne "One was sitting," but if John does not describe the throne, far less does he attempt to describe its Divine occupant. Indeed what he saw was rather a glory than an actual form; with sublime ambiguity he says, "He that sat was to look upon like a jasper and a sardius." The "jasper" most probably indicated the colorless splendor of the diamond, with which the red hue of the sardius mingled in mystic wonderful combination. All these things formed in a sense a single object, the equipage of the Most High; in the forefront of which burned seven lamps of fire, while around it, as far as the eye could reach, stretched a sea of glass.

FAITH IN GOD.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing June 30. Heb. 11: 1-17; 32-40; 12: 1, 2.

FAITH ought not to be the mystery that it is to the majority of men. When one asks, "What shall I do to be saved?" and is told, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," he is apt to be disappointed. The answer seems to be the theological jargon which does not belong to the language of ordinary life. Yet this faith, this believing in Christ, is the same thing in essence, however it differs in degree, from faith in men and things, that we perfectly understand and constantly exercise. A parent knows that his child will get no good from his teacher if the child has no faith in the teacher. A physician finds it difficult to cure a patient who has no faith in him or in his remedies. There is no mystery in either case and no explanation is needed. We know that distrust on one side produces powerlessness on the other. The child becomes impatient, performs his tasks perfunctorily, takes no interest in his work, makes no effort. But let faith come in, let him believe in his teacher as a wise man, who can help him, who can make a man of him and whose methods are good, and the character of his work is changed. He will labor at studies, the value of which he cannot understand, because he is sure that in some way they will be beneficial to him, otherwise his teacher would not have recommended them. The patient is similarly affected. If he has faith in his physician he obeys his instructions as to diet and exercise and takes his medicine punctually; but if he has no faith in him, he is negligent and disobedient. So faith affects conduct and besides that effect, it produces in the mind a sympathetic attitude, which becomes a channel of influence. The effect of faith as the way of salvation is also simple in our actual life. A boy who has a good father goes from a quiet farm into a busy city. He falls into sin, becomes addicted to drink or gambling, and robs his employer. Two ways are open to him: One is to put himself in his father's hands, confessing his sin, and try to get free from his propensities under his father's help and guidance. That is the way of recovery—the way upward. The other way is to avoid the father, to dread his displeasure, to go deeper into sin, continuing in vice, trying only to escape punishment. That is the way of ruin—the way downward. The way a young man so situated will choose, depends on two things. Whether he desires to reform and whether he is sure that his father still loves him in spite of what he has done and will help him to reform—in other words whether he has faith in his father. Faith is no mystery in such a case. It is such faith Christ asks. To any one desiring to be saved from sin, from degradation, from evil in every shape, he says, "Look to me; put your trust in me; I can save you and I will. The man who complies honestly and sincerely is surprised at the result. He finds that he is helped, that his love of sin decreases and turns into hate; that his better nature grows stronger and that his feeble, halting efforts after good grow more vigorous and effective. So he that believes is saved.

THE CHANGE IN OHIO.

Mr. S. D. Gordon, State Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. of Ohio, has resigned his office to devote himself exclusively to evangelistic work. In his letter of resignation Mr. Gordon says: "Having been in active connection with the Association movement for nearly a score of years, I believe as firmly as ever in the Young Men's Christian Association; the unquestionable value af its work; the wisdom of its methods; the immense power of its strategic position as an inter-denominational agency; and that it has been specially raised up by God as a leading factor of his Church to meet the needs of young men and of city life. I shall always be glad that I was permitted to give the best I had to its service during these years. It is that I may be free to devote myself wholly to evangelistic work that I sever my official connection with the Ohio Associations. In doing so, I am simply following a conviction that has been growing within me for years, that my share in the hastening of the coming of Christ's kingdom is to be in the general evangelistic field. I feel the freer to follow my conviction and heart's desire now that the State Committee has been so fortunate as to secure the services of Mr. Doggett, who knows so thoroughly the Ohio field and is so well known throughout the State for his indefatigable energy, shrewd judgment and earnest spirit. There will be no break in the continuity of the work.

Mr. Gorden expects to enter at once upon his new work, either in New England or Ohio. Mr. Laurence L. Doggett was unanimously elected State Secretary, to begin his work September 1, 1895. Mr. Doggett graduated at Oberlin College in '86 and at the Oberlin Theological Seminary in '89, having taken a year meanwhile at Union Seminary in New York City. For the past two years he has been pursuing postgraduate work at Leipsic University, Germany. He has been engaged in the State Y. M. C. A. work of Ohio with the exception of the times spent in special study, so that he is thoroughly conversant with the work and field to which he has been called.

IN THE SETTLEMENT.

In the article on the University Settlements of New York, which appeared in this journal on May 22, very little was said about the feature of the work which in other strata of society would be characterized as club life. That feature is so important and has proved so beneficial in the neighborhood, that it might easily be adopted by other organizations which are concerned for the welfare of the poor around them. Two pictures taken by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S special artist in the settlement at twenty-six Delancey Street appear on this page. The gymnasium is on the ground floor, and is fully equipped with dumb-bells, Indian clubs, parallel bars, mattresses and other apparatus. Four afternoons of each week it is used by the various Boys' Clubs connected with the Settlement. On two evenings it is devoted to the use of young men over eighteen who by payment of three cents, are entitled to the use of a shower-bath. On other evenings the gymnasium is reserved for women with a like privilege, and they are no less eager than the young men fo avail themselves of the opportunity for physical culture. The second picture is of the Boys' Club room which is in almost constant use. There any boy may introduce a friend, may sit and talk with him, play a quiet game or read a book out of the library. In the evening the room is the meeting place of the boys' clubs and is a very lively place, indeed. The advantages of such opportunities are obvious. The streets were formerly the only place where the boys could enjoy each other's society until they were old enough to be admitted to the saloons. In the Settlement they come in contact with men of education and refinement and, while the utmost liberty is allowed them and they manage their own affairs, they feel the influences of the place and the people and are gently guided to a better life than they would know in any other way. Too much praise cannot be given to Mr. James B. Reynolds the head worker, and the noble young men and women who are giving their lives in this quiet unostentatious way to the elevation of the poor. They are following the example of Christ who, though "he was in the form of God and thought it not robbery to be equal with God," yet came down and lived his lowly life among men that he might redeem them from their sins.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

Three prize banners will be awarded at the Baltimore convention of the Baptist Young People's Union for the best State or provincial records of local society work for the year 1894-95 in the Senior department of the Christian Culture Courses. The banners are to be determined in each case by the number of societies represented, and by the number of successful examinees.

The Faces of Children.

How Christianity and Culture Efface the Traces of Vice and Ignorance in Young Features—An Indian Family Group.

It has frequently been a subject of remark that "the work of grace upon a human face," in a great majority of cases, produces such a transformation as to afford convincing proof of the spiritual peace within. While this is probably most strongly apparent in the case of those who have undergone the change after reaching manhood or womanhood, it is also true of children. Especially are we struck with the contrast between the face of the offspring of the vicious and the criminal and those of the sons and daughters of refined Christian parents; but if the former are afforded an opportunity to learn morals and manners, the difference quickly disappears. There are sweeter or more intelligent faces than some of those to be found in benevolent institutions, where these waifs and the children of the slums are being trained to useful Christian lives after a rescue from degrading and wretched environments.

In the great Indian School at Carlisle, Pa., where several hundred boys and girls belonging to the different tribes are in training, there are many striking instances of the facial change that comes over a child when, after being taken out of a wild and wholly untutored life, it is surrounded by the wholesome moral and educational influences. These children are of almost every age, from the wee, brown tots of six to the well-grown boy or girl of sixteen. They are taken right from the wigwam or the bare prairie and transferred to clean, attractive rooms, nice playgrounds, and congenial companionships. The girls are under the immediate care of teachers called "school-mothers," and their education includes music and the ordinary branches,—housework, sewing, cooking, mending, laundrywork, housekeeping, and dressmaking. Some are trained as nurses. The boys, too, receive a sound, practical education, which is supplemented by manual training. All are taught the uses of economy, practical economy, and the value of industrial effort. Their religious training is the most important of all and is specially calculated to bring out all the best points in the Indian character. They have their own library and religious studies, too, and the King's Sons' and Daughters' circles are large and active organizations.

Once a year, during vacation, they have an outing, when they are sent into families, the girls to do practical housework, the boys to work on farms. When they reach the wage-earning age, their savings are placed to their credit, and sometimes amount to a considerable sum. Their aggregate earnings for 1894 were $14,073.09, of which the boys earned $10,945.78 and the girls $3,127.31. Their savings for the year were $6,386.06, of which $4,756.03 went to the credit of the boys and $1,630.03 to the girls.

On this page we are enabled, through the courtesy of "The Silver Cross," to present photographs of two groups of children from the Carlisle School which show the transforming power of such training on the Indian features and character. These children are Pueblo Indians, who came to the school several years ago, in the condition shown in the first group. The second group, which can scarcely be recognized as the same children, shows how thoroughly the wild, uncouth, hunted look of the first group, indicative of a low grade of intelligence and strong animal propensities, has been effaced by the mental and spiritual cultivation they have undergone. In the latter group, the expression on each face is sweet and kindly; the eyes beam with the light of intellect; the mouth is firm, self-reliant, yet tender and humane, and the lowered brows and crouching aspect have wholly disappeared, being replaced by an unrestrained and even graceful bearing, conveying the impression of manliness on the part of the boys. Would that all the Indian children and, for that matter, all the poor neglected children, white, black or brown, in our native land were under influences as ennobling as those that have been the means of so transforming the faces and brightening the lives of these young wards of the nation at Carlisle School.

One Touch of Kindness.

No kind action is ever wasted. Somewhere it finds root and springs up to life in God's sweet sunshine in other hearts. In a leading thoroughfare, writes an observer, I saw an old gentleman pause as though undecided which way to turn. His head was white with the snows of many winters, and his face bore that benign look that is only attained in the school of severest adversity. At this moment some one passed, and he hailed her to ask for directions to reach a well-known clergyman of our city. The person addressed stopped, and, glancing up, said, "Come; I will show you." They passed on a few doors in my direction, and halted. "Here is the place," she said, opening the gate for him to enter. He turned reverently said, "God bless you, whoever you are; I am blind." She was only a schoolgirl, laden with books. She could easily have given verbal directions. She was ignorant of his great calamity; but what thoughtful consideration! What a brightening moment in a darkened life!

Housekeeping Cares.

Instead of the physical part of our nature being our servant, writes Mrs. C. F. Wilder, the vice-President of the National Household Economic Association, it is more and more becoming our master. The housemother, instead of being controlled by her intellectual nature, is too often governed by the animal nature of her family. If it is doughnuts, cake, pastry, pies, that the family demand; doughnuts, cake, pastry, pies, it is from Monday morning until Saturday night. The house-mother, after a time, has a pride in saying, "I can do but little for my family, but one thing is certain—they have what they want to eat and "the best in the market;" and by the best in the market" she means that they procured food for which the highest prices were paid. Such a house-mother ought to learn to look at life from the farther end of the route. What has she stored in her brain for use in old age? "Kitchen lore?" What will her children say of her when she is worn out as their slave? "She made such good doughnuts?" What will she reply to the Master when he asks what sheaves she garnered for the harvest in his kingdom? She will be forced to look at her empty hands and mournfully say, "Lord, not one thing to show for my life-work! It is all eaten up."

What a blessed and happy home is that in which knowledge and wisdom have so simplified the tasks of the house-mother, that her cares lie lightly upon her and she has time for spiritual as well as for material things.

A great aid in this direction is proper economy and the study of what is really best for use in the household. The best is always the simplest and very often the cheapest also.

IN HIS LOVE.

LIKE a cradle, rocking, rocking,
Silent, peaceful, to and fro,
Like a mother's sweet looks dropping
On the little face below,
Hangs the green earth, swinging, turning,
Jarless, noiseless, safe, and slow;
Falls the light of God's face bending
Down and watching us below.

And as feeble babes that suffer,
Toss and cry, and will not rest,
Are the ones the tender mother
Holds the closest, loves the best;
So when we are weak and wretched,
By our sins weighed down, distressed,
Then it is that God's great patience,
Holds us closest, loves us best.

O, great heart of God! whose loving Cannot hindered be, nor crossed,
Will not weary, will not even
In our death itself be lost.
Love divine! of such great loving
Only mothers know the cost—
Cost of love which, all love passing,
Gave a Son to save the lost.

VANISHED CHILDREN.

THOSE who have lost an infant are never, as it were, without an infant child, wrote Leigh Hunt. The other children grow up into manhood and womanhood, and suffer all the changes of mortality, but this one alone is rendered an immortal child. Death has arrested it with his kindly harshness and blessed it into an eternal image of youth. The remembered innocence and endearments of a child stand instead of virtues that have died older. Children have not exercised the voluntary offices of friendship; they have not chosen to be kind and good to us; nor stood by us, from conscious will, in the hour of adversity. But they have shared the pleasures and pains with us as well as they could; the interchange of good offices betwixt us has of necessity been less mingled with the troubles of the world; the sorrow arising from their death is the only one which we can associate with their memories. These are happy thoughts that cannot die.

A Helpful Rest.

"I remember well the advice an old family friend gave me when I was a young mother," said an elderly lady. "'Whenever you feel tired,' he used to say, 'or discouraged, or depressed, or out of sorts generally, you should lie down and be absolutely quiet for fifteen minutes. The eyes should be closed, and the mind should be made a blank, as far as possible. No pillow should be used, the head reclining on a level with the shoulders. You should not even think of the time, but have some one call you at the expiration of the time."

Mother Knew His Voice.

Thirty years ago a young man left his home in England to come here. Last summer he returned, a middled-aged pastor, to visit his mother. He found her in the old rocking-chair where she had nursed all her children, but she could not rise at once. She looked up with a touch of wonder, but when he said "mother," she cried "I did not know your face, but I know your voice." There were only a few threads of silver in her hair when he left home, but now it had grown all white. But the mother's love was stronger than ever.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Welcome.

WE will not try to describe the meeting between mother and son, it was a joyful reunion, and no family in the city could boast of being happier, than the one that gathered in Mrs. Mapleton's little parlor in the tenement house that morning.

Will was seated in a great easy chair on one arm of which sat Alice, holding one of his hands, while his mother sat on an ottoman on the other side, with his other hand in hers.

"I can't see where I can crowd in," said Fred, "so I will deliver the patient over to you; you'll find him very unruly sometimes, and what you will do with him, or where you will stow him, is a mystery to me, but he has come to stay. He would bring his trunk, saying that he would not leave his mother and sister again, until he was strong and well, eveu if he had to sleep on the floor."

"Which shows that he can appreciate the ingenuity of women, better than another young gentleman of my acquaintance can," said Alice.

"Or, that the tonic he has been swallowing, has not as yet done much for his brain," said Fred, laughing.

"Come and see," said Alice. "Mamma help me to lift this invalid to his feet."

"Oh! I'm not so bad as that Alice, I am quite strong again," said Will, "and I can not only arise without assistance, but could carry you two little creatures."

And he did look more like a young giant than an invalid, as he stood between Alice and his mother, with an arm around each. They crossed the hall and Fred was really astonished when they entered the room.

"Why, mother, this is too jolly for anything, I felt like crying when I saw the outside of this house, but it's like a little heaven inside," said Will.

"There is where it differs from some of our former homes," said Alice.

"But Alice, how have you made such a change in so short a time? it beats any transformarion scene I ever saw, are you a magician?" asked Fred.

"No," said Alice, "I am a Cinderella and have a god-mother who is a fairy, and her name is Callaghan. It was not only her suggestion, but she has done the whole thing herself."

"She must be a remarkable woman," said Will.

"She is," said Mrs. Mapleton; "she seems to be two persons in one; she is as gentle as a child and as tender hearted as a saint; but offend her, or hurt one of her children and in a moment she is another person, as rough as a common sailor in her language, and ready for a rough and tumble fight. She will listen to Alice reading, and her quick smiles or tears show that she understands, and as she says herself—an hour after will be as merry with her other neighbors, laughing at their rough and ready jokes, or silly songs and as happy as she was with us."

"Quite an original character, a diamond in the rough," said Fred. "Why has she put two beds in the room? Who is the second bed for?"

"For your lordship, if you can come down from the grand hotel to the tenement house for a short time," laughed Alice, "and if you two can occupy the same room peacefully."

"Oh, that will be jolly, and we shall agree, perfectly," said Fred, as he slapped Will on the back, "and for once you have shown better sense than I, by bringing your traps with you."

"Why do you say, 'for once?' I don't want to boast, but if you said, 'as usual,' instead of 'for once,' you would be showing becoming humility," said Will with a smile of badinage for his friend.

"In spite of all Alice and our kind friend have done," said Mrs. Mapleton, "it is a poor home to welcome you to, my boy."

"Will put his arm affectionately around his mother's shoulder and kissed her. "Dear mother," he said, "don't worry about such things. We have so much reason to be thankful. I have learned a good deal in the way of faith since I have been away. I think it is well to be afflicted sometimes. We are such selfish creatures, and so headstrong, that the Lord has to sometimes use harsh measures to bring us to him, and to ourselves. When I look back and think of the time when we had everything heart could wish, if I had been told then, that my mother and sister would one day live in a tenement house, and in the poorest part of the city, it would have seemed an awful calamity, and I should have thought how miserable we would all be; but now these three small rooms are the sweetest spot on earth. I never knew the meaning of 'Home, Sweet Home, there's no Place Like Home,' and I never loved and honored my mother as I do at this moment."

"I am so glad that you are pleased, dear boy, but I deserve no credit," said his mother. "I was weak, and fretful, and rebellious; I was like a sulky child, I would not be comforted. I thought only of myself and my own suffering, and instead of helping Alice, who had more to bear than I had, I actually added to her burdens."

"Or in other words," said Alice, "you were very ill for weeks, and so weak that for days you wandered in your mind, and when I hear you talk like that I think you must be a little flighty still."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

A Happy Dinner-Party.

It was a thoroughly happy company that sat down to dinner in Mrs. Mapleton's little parlor that afternoon, and whether from an artistic or epicurean point of view, seldom has a more unique repast been set before a company than the one prepared by Mrs. Callaghan and Alice for the celebration.

Before dinner, Alice asked Mrs. Callaghan to take her brother's trunk—the one that was sent home—to his room, so with Larry's help it was carried across the hall; but Mrs. Callaghan not wishing to be seen by the young gentleman until she was "fixed up," left Larry at the door with the trunk. When Will opened the door, there stood a small boy and a large trunk.

"Please, sur, Miss Alice sent me wid yer trunk; it's the one ye sint home when yez were dead."

"Oh, yes, I recognize the old fellow, but you see I wasn't quite dead when they sent it," said Will.

"Shure, I might have known that," said Larry, with a grin. "I mean it's the one ye had when ye was kilt."

"Yes, that is much better," said Will, "but let me help you get it in; you did not bring it over alone, did you?"

"No, sur, mother helped me, but she just knocked at the door and then dodged."

And what is your name and who is your mother?" asked Will.

"My name, sur, is Larry, and my mother is Mrs. Callaghan."

"Oh, yes, I have heard of you and your good mother; she has been very kind to my mother, and my sister says that you have been a real good boy to her, and done many acts of kindness for her."

"I'm glad she said it, sur, but what did I ever do for her? Shure, she's done lots and lots of things for us, but I never did nothin' for her, only once," said Larry, brightening up; "I licked two fellows for calling after her on the street, but she didn't know that, cos I waited till she got 'round the corner."

"And why did you wait?" asked Will, who was trying to look serious.

"Cos she told me I musn't fight, only in self 'fence, I think she called it, and I didn't know if it was one of them times or not, so I waited till she turned de corner, then I pitched into them."

"You are a brave boy," said Will, as he slipped a dollar into Larry's hand.

"What is this fur?" asked Larry as he stared at the money.

"For yourself," answered Will.

"Oh, but I daren't take it, sur. Mother'd be mad if I took anything for doin' a job for Miss Alice."

"Well, tell her it was a gentleman whom she never saw that you did the job for."

Larry took a sly look at the dollar in his hand, and the temptation was too strong to be resisted, so he slipped it into his pocket and said, "Thank you, sur, I will."

As Larry opened the door to leave, Will caught sight of Mrs. Callaghan, who was on the landing waiting for Larry. Will went out to meet her. "I am sure this is Mrs. Callaghan," he said, offering his hand.

"It is, sur, and you are Mr. Mapleton, and I've heard so much about ye from yer beautiful mother and sister, that I was afeared I should be afther calling ye Willie, if I saw ye all of a sudden loike, instead of Mr. Mapleton, and I'm proud to meet ye, sur, and welcome ye home after all yer sickness and fightin' and the loike in furrin countries."

"And I am very proud to meet you, Mrs. Callaghan, and to thank you for the batties you fought here at home for my mother and sister, when they needed a champion; by the bye, isn't this the landing where you fought the first battle and defeated the enemy. My sister told me it was on this very spot."

"Did she tell you that now," ha! ha! ha! ye'll excuse me sur, but I can't help it, I laugh every time I think of it, even when I'm alone, but I was always afeard that Miss Alice was a bit offended 'cause I lost my temper, and when I do that I'm rough and ugly wid my tongue. It takes a power o' training to keep yer temper and be a lady all the time like Miss Alice, and of course I can't do it; but that's the only time in my life, when I lost my temper and got real mad, and didn't feel sorry for it afterwards, and I don't to this day. But I'm running on and hindering your honor while the dinner is waiting for yez." The good woman hurried away, and Will dressed for the meal as expeditiously as he could.

It was a dinner long to be remembered. No one acquainted with the facts could have believed that the beautiful, bright, and happy lady with the pretty headdress, at the head of the table, was the same Mrs. Mapleton that they knew three years ago, or that the young man who by his wit and humor, kept the table in a roar of laughter, was an invalid, and at the point of death not many weeks before, and had been mourned as dead; or that the fresh looking, beautiful girl so full of life and spirit, was our Alice of old, whom we have seen in her shabby, genteel dress, going hurriedly into Mr. Jacobs pawnshop, or wending her way slowly to give her drawing lessons.

"It is the jolliest meal I have ever had," said Fred, "but I must go, business must be attended to; and say, Will, I have been all the morning with Graham and things are in a much better shape than I expected to find them; we shall recover almost everything."

"And I think I can truly say that it is the first meal I have enjoyed for years," said Mrs. Mapleton.

"And I want to go out this afternoon," said Will, "I am quite strong enough and I will not leave you long."

"You will do no such thing," said Alice. "You will remain here with mamma, at any rate until I come back, as I have—as Fred says—to attend to some very important business. I shall be back in less than an hour, and then if you must go, I will go with you."

Alice had been putting on her hat and gloves while speaking, and before any questions could be asked, had descended the stairs, and entered a carriage which she had ordered and was driven away.

"Where can the child be going, in such a hurry?" said Mrs. Mapleton, as she watched from the window the quickly vanishing cab.

Mrs. Mapleton and Will seated themselves on the little sofa—he with his arm around his mother—while she told him the story of the life they had lived during his absence, carefully avoiding, however, any reference to the Wilsons, the arrest of Alice, and the trial, she wisely thinking it best to wait until he was stronger before telling him the sad story.

Then the sound of the returning carriage was heard, and had they been looking, they might have seen two ladies—one of whom was Alice—alight and enter the house.

"Allow me to introduce a dear young friend of mine," said Alice as they came in.

Will, as soon as he had caught sight of the second lady, sprang to his feet, "Why, it's Louie, it's Louie," he cried as he sprang forward.

At the sound of his voice, Louie—for it was she—shrieked and clung convulsively to Alice.

"Oh, Alice, is it Willie?" she cried, "or am I dreaming?"

"Why you surely know me, Louie," said Will trying to take her hands.

"It is—it is—Willie—and alive, and they told me you were dead," she sobbed, as he folded her to his breast; "they told me you were dead, and I have been mourning for you, for weeks," she said between her sobs, "but I am so glad."

"I never thought of that, I did not suppose that you had heard, I did not know that you and Alice were acquainted. No wonder you were startled, I intended coming over this afternoon to call upon you," said Will, as he held her hand in a strong clinging grasp.

"I felt sure it was to Louie that you were thinking of going," said Alice, "and I did not think that was wise. But did not want you to be thwarted altogether, so I brought Louie here. It was best the meeting should take place among sympathetic people. I do not think you would either of you have been so happy in it at Louie's home as you are here."

"I do not know about that," said Will; "I know I could not be more happy than I am; but I should be happy anywhere if Louie were with me. Mother, do you know this dear girl? We loved each other long ago, but I did not tell you because there was no engagement between us and one time it seemed as if there never would be. I think it will all come right, now, and I hope you will love her as a daughter."

Mrs. Mapleton took the blushing girl in her arms and kissed her affectionately. "I am sure I shall love her," she said. You have not heard yet, you do not know how much reason I have to love her apart from all this. She showed herself a true brave girl and a good friend when friends were few and were sorely needed. I love her then, when I did not know how dear she was to my boy and I shall love her more now for his sake."

Louie seated herself by Mrs. Mapleton's side, looking the gratitude from her soft dark eyes that she had no words to express. She was still trembling with agitation and love and fear seemed to struggle for the mastery in her breast. As she grew more calm while they talked she said: "But I cannot understand it. Why did they harrow my heart by telling me you were dead? It was cruel! cruel! Why Alice, you said it was true. Didn't you know?"

"Oh no; I have only known that it was a mistake since last night. I said and thought he really was dead and we have grieved over him for months. He will tell you all about it. He was severely wounded and he would have died but for the kindest, noblest, best of men."

"Who is that, you are calling such names?" said Fred, who had opened the door unheard and was standing behind Alice's chair unknown to her.

"You are taking a mean advantage of me. I do not like eavesdropping," said Alice. "I will not tell you anything about it. But here is some one you must know. This is Miss Louie Wilson, Mr. Fred Morgan. As my friend and Will's friend too, she has a double claim on your friendship."

Fred greeted her warmly. "I have heard of you before," he said, looking her earnestly. "The first time was a long way off in the hut of a rough settler. I did not know where to find you then but were pretty badly wanted I assure you. Mr. Will here was very peremptory about your being found."

The story had to be told again for Louie's benefit and as Mrs. Mapleton had heard it all before, she considerately excused herself on the plea of helping Mrs. Callaghan, and went into that kind woman's domain, leaving the young people to their own society.

A DAUNTLESS MISSIONARY.*

SOME thirty-eight years ago, a young Englishman named William Duncan landed at Fort Simpson, about seven miles south of the Alaskan boundary. He came alone, knowing nothing of the people among whom he was about to cast his lot, but at the early age of twenty-four solemnly dedicated his life to the cause of raising from barbarism a race whose frequent acts of cannibalism stamped them as among the most savage people on the face of the earth.

Fort Simpson was, for many years, one of the most important trading posts of the Hudson's Bay Company. It is truly said that in the number of bear skins necessary for a native to purchase a muzzle-loading rifle depended upon the number, piled one upon another, that it took to reach the muzzle of the gun, when the butt end rested on the ground. The agents of this company were stockaded behind stockades, within which enclosure only a certain number of natives were ever admitted at one time. Young this dauntless youth, filled with the spirit of the Master, and full of confidence in the over-ruling Providence, dwelt in a cabin, through the sides of which there were no port-holes, and within whose walls no rifle was at hand in case of an attack from outside. Metlakahtla was the village that Mr. Duncan established more than a third of a century ago. There eight hundred natives lived and prospered. Taught by their devoted friend, they sawed logs, built houses, canned salmon, and engaged in nearly every branch of business that would utilize the products of the country. A church edifice that would do credit to many a larger white settlement, reared its spire heavenward, and every man, woman and child in the settlement regularly sought religious consolation there.

Then at a representative of the Church of England appeared among them, and insisted at that portion of the sacrament wherein wine is administered, and which Mr. Duncan had ignored, should be observed. His reason for not carrying out this important tenet of the church, was that he had found his greatest trouble in teaching the natives to avoid intoxicating drinks; and he reasoned that if he permitted wine at the sacrament, his people would not understand why they should not indulge in liquor at other times.

Mr. Duncan's prejudice in this matter was so strong that he said if his course was not permitted, he would take his people like the pilgrims of old, to some place where they could exercise religious liberty, unhammeled by church dogmas. The church ruling was inconsistent, and Mr. Duncan, equally determined, went to Washington, sought the President and explained how the Church of England had attempted to supplant him with another minister among the people to whom he had devoted his life.

He was assured by the President that the government would offer an asylum where they could enjoy religious freedom; and promised that Congress would take action, looking to their protection. Accordingly, on March 3, 1891, a bill was passed, setting aside Annette island for the use and benefit of these natives, but immediately following his visit to Washington, and upon the strength of the promise that his people would be protected, they abandoned their improvements, and property, gave up their comfortable homes, and with only a few household goods, went out into the wilderness. On the seventh day of August, 1887, they arrived at their present home, naming it New Metlakahtla, and under the graceful folds of the Stars and Stripes, which they had flung to the breeze, they solemnly transferred their allegiance from Canada to the United States.

Since, the past seven years a settlement has been built up that bears witness of wonderful progress in civilization by these people. They live in comfortable houses, many of them handsome and homelike. Every branch of business is represented, as in their old home, only in a more advanced scale, and the people are self-sustaining, industrious and happy.

THE TRUE SOURCE OF SUCCESS.†

HAS God abdicated? Is the universe an infinite chaos in which order has no throne? Is law a fable? Is life a Babel? Is the world a Pandemonium? Then is there such a game of chance as men call luck. But as long as the smallest atom or the largest sun, the invisible animalculæ or the most glorious archangel, the soul soaring from its tenement of clay or the sparrow falling to the earth, acknowledge equally his ruling power, Nature will play no blindman's-buff. If ten deaf, dumb, and blind men were placed in line in a ten-acre lot, and left to wander until all who lived long enough were in line once more, the thing would be accomplished only at the death of the ninth man. Has luck ever made a fool speak words of wisdom; an ignoramus utter lectures on science; a dolt write an Odyssey, an Ænid, a Paradise Lost, or a Hamlet; a loafer become a Girard or Astor, a Rothschild, Stewart, Vanderbilt, Field, Gould, or Rockefeller; a coward win at Yorktown, Wagram, Waterloo, or Richmond; a careless stonecutter carve an Apollo, a Minerva, a Venus de Medici, or a Greek Slave? Does luck raise rich crops on the land of the sluggard, weeds and brambles on that of the industrious farmer? Does luck make the drunkard sleek and attractive, and his home cheerful, while the temperate man looks haggard and suffers want and misery? Does luck starve honest labor and pamper idleness? Does luck put common sense at a discount, folly at a premium? Does it cast intelligence into the gutter, and raise ignorance to the skies? Does it imprison virtue, and laud vice? Did luck give Watt his engine, Franklin his captive lightning, Whitney his cotton-gin, Fulton his steamboat, Morse his telegraph, Blanchard his lath, Howe his sewing-machine, Goodyear his rubber, Bell his telephone, Edison his phonograph?

"Luck is ever waiting for something to turn up," says Cobden; "labor, with keen eyes and strong will, will turn up something. Luck lies in bed and wishes the postman would bring him the news of a legacy; labor turns out at six o'clock, and with busy pen or ringing hammer lays the foundation of a competence. Luck whines: labor whistles. Luck relies on chance; labor, on character."

"With the aid or under the influence of pluck," says the London "Lancet," "it is possible not only to surmount what appear to be insuperable obstructions, but to defy and repel the ennuities of climate, adverse circumstances, and even disease."

Stick to the thing and carry it through. Believe you were made for the place you fill, and that no one else can fill it as well. Put forth your whole energies. Be awake, electrify yourself; go forth to the task. Only once learn to carry a thing through in all its completeness and proportion, and you will become a hero. You will think better of yourself; others wil think better of you. The world in its heart admires the stern, determined doer.

Consumption Cured.

DEAR MR. CONGREVE:

As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies, and very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you mine as your due. What I have used and found perfect in its work, I gladly recommend to others. I feel that it is my duty to tell my fellow-men of it. I ask no fee for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation.

Yours Heartily,

We Direct Special Attention to the following Remarkable Statement:

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which affected my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment.

BAMBINO-WORSHIP AT ROME.

At a recent meeting of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in England, Rev. Hugh Price Hughes related the following incident, which he witnessed in Rome last autumn:

"In the Ara Coeli, the most important church of the Franciscan order in Rome itself, on the Capitoline Hill, they have what they call a 'bambino,' which is Latin for baby. I was not prepared to pay anything to see that particular child myself, but there was a devout and aristocratic French lady in the building when I was there, and she paid, and I saw at her expense, standing behind her. A fat old priest brought out the 'bambino' — a podgy, hideous wooden doll, covered with jewelry. He presented it to this aristocratic lady and others, and they beslobbered it with kisses and bowed incessantly as long as they saw it. Then he put it to bed and locked it up again. Later on, at Christmas, I saw that wooden idol taken, with the utmost possible ceremony, and placed at the opposite end of the church, and then, with a great ecclesiastical procession and much further ceremony, finally escorted back again to bed about six o'clock in the evening. The ridiculous wooden doll is reverenced and worshipped. It is taken about Rome to [illegible] carriage, something like the carriage in which our Lord Mayor goes in procession; and when anybody is ill, this podgy wooden doll is taken round to cure the sick, and they believe it! That is Popery! That is what the Pope wants you to accept to-day. It is contemptible; it is beneath contempt! And this goes on under the eyes of the Pope, with his full sanction and authority, in Rome to-day."

PROVING IT FROM THE BIBLE.

While a naval officer was inspecting one of the schools in the island of Barbadoes, containing two hundred negro boys and girls, a sign was made by one of the children by holding up his hand, intimating that he wished to speak to the master. On going up to the child, who was somewhat more than eight years old, the master inquired what was the matter. "Massa," he replied, with a look of horror and indignation which the officer said he should never forget, and pointing to a little boy of the same age, who sat beside him,—"Massa, this boy says he does not believe in the resurrection." "That is very bad," said the master: "but do you, my little fellow," addressing the young informer, "believe in the resurrection yourself?" "Yes, massa, I do." But can you prove it from the Bible?" "Yes, massa; Jesus says, 'I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet he shall live;' and in another place, 'Because I live, ye shall live also.'" The master added, "Can you prove it from the Old Testament also?" "Yes; for Job says, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God.' And David says, in one of his psalms, 'I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness.'" "But are you sure these passages are in the Bible? Here is a Bible, point them out to us." The little lad found all the passages and read them aloud to the surprise and delight of the visitors.

A LEGEND OF THE NILE.

NATIVES of Egypt relate this pretty legend of the Nile to explain the discontinuance of human sacrifices to the heathen deity who was supposed to rule that famous river: Amr, a noted Mohammedan general, captured the city of Cairo in. D. 640. Long before then there had been a heathen ceremony, and a virgin was yely sacrificed to the god of the river. When the season came around, Amr was cad upon as usual to sacrifice the girl. Hsternly refused. That year the Nile fiel was a failure. One can imagine how thindignant heathen population must have rad at the invader, and said, "We wned you what would happen if you did nopropitiate the river god also." How Ar's wild Arab soldier's must have had th faith sorely tried, and how they must ha felt puzzled as to whether in this strige new country, with its temples and pymids, obelisks and sphinxes, it might nove as well to make friends of the local go. Could Allah really help them here? Agn the flood-time came around. This tin Amr surely would sacrifice the girl an save the land. No; he did not. The pele rose in rebellion; Amr stood firm. Bule wrote to the Kalif Omar for orders (th same Omar who has come down in hisry as the destroyer of the famous Alxandrian library). Omar approved of hisonduct but sent him a paper to throw inthe Nile. On the paper was written: "fm Abd Allah Omar, Prince of the Faful, to the Nile of Egypt: If thou flo of thine own accord, flow not; but if it Allah, the One the Mighty, who causeth nee to flow, then we implore him to ma thee flow." Amr threw the paper intthe water, and the Nile rose forthwith exa v as it was wanted. Since that day no l has been sacrificed; but a pillar of ear is yearly left to be washed away in the iddle of the canal, called "the bride" or "he girl," the only relic of the ancient heaen custom of living sacrifice.

LIFTING UP THE FALLEN.

The rescue work of "The Door of Hope" among fallen girls, is one of the most promising of the kind in New York city. It is strictly a faith work. In a little over four years, since "The Door of Hope" was founded by Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, $42,000 was received from generous friends with which amount two houses have been purchased and furnished, and more than five hundred girls have been sheltered and cared for besides a large number of extra girls which have been supplied to trantien ases. The Home is at 102 E. 61 St. Every encouragement is extended to the girls in the Home, not only to reform and lead useful lives, but also to realize the love of the Saviour as he gently leads them by his spirit into the fulness of his grace. Many have opened their hearts to the Lord and are rejoicing in the freedom wherewith he has made them free. Some of his number have returned to their parents, while the have married, while a few have entered their heavenly abode. Interesting meetings are held at the Home every Thursday 11 A. M., when friends are invited.

AMERICA'S "SINGING PILGRIM."

Philip Phillips' Glorious Career Drawing to a Close—How a Farmer's Boy, Surmounting many Obstacles, became a Grand Maestro of Christian Song and Drew Multitudes to Christ—The Wonderful Record of a Noble and Helpful Life.

AT the climax of a career of unexampled activity, in a sphere peculiarly his own, and which has won him the warmest love and admiration of the Christian world, binding to him equally the hearts of the cultured and the simple by virtue of a rare and divinely-bestowed talent, Philip Phillips, "the Singing Pilgrim," lies seriously ill at the house of a friend in Delaware, O. For months past he has been under medical care, but his disease is none that yields readily to treatment. The prayers of God's people everywhere will unite in his behalf, with those of the loving watchers by his bedside, for Philip Phillips has, in his busy life, been a helper to many who now bear him in grateful remembrance.

P. D. Sankey, himself one of the sweetest Gospel singers the century has produced, received, through listening to Philip Phillips' wondrous songs, the first impulse that led him to adopt the career of a singing evangelist. He had heard many singers before, but none of them had thrilled him as the great Chautauquan did.

"Phillips' voice," Mr. Sankey declares, "possesses that rare quality of earnest pathos and deep feeling that goes to the heart of the hearer, and thrills through every fibre of his frame. It inspired me and I said in my heart: 'Oh, if I could only sing like that!'"

Such a voice as Mr. Phillips possessed in his balmy days was indeed one to render effective the Gospel of song. He sang straight to the souls of the multitudes, and his pure and clarion-like notes, now loud and strong like a martial call, anon soft and tender as a mother's lullaby, produced an effect such as had rarely been witnessed in any religious services within the memory of a generation. That his consecrated genius set Sankey's heart aflame and unlocked those vocal treasures that have since delighted multitudes in many lands, is none least of the fruits of Philip Phillips' life for which the Christian world owes him a debt of gratitude.

Philip Phillips was the pioneer in the work of attaching the graceful color of music to the gospel chant, and has enjoyed an abundant measure of God's favor and blessing. Not content with the harvest of souls God gave him in America and Great Britain, he carried the melodious message to less favored lands; and under southern skies and in tropical climates, and in countries newly settled, he has raised his voice in celebration of the triumphs of the Cross, singing "the Lord's song in a strange lands." The story of his life is one as full of interest as any ever detailed in the pages of romance. It is a constantly moving panorama and as we follow his footsteps we tread the streets of great cities such as New York, Boston, Cincinnati, New Orleans and San Francisco, and the rural ways of western villages; we see the strange scenes of the Sandwich Islands, and the busy young life of Australia and New Zealand; on to London, Liverpool, Edinburgh and Dublin, and the centres of Old World civilization; on again to Rome and Jerusalem and Egypt, and the classic lands of bygone days, and still further to the unfamiliar Asiatic scenes of Calcutta, Delhi, and the banks of the Ganges, where idolatry and superstition still exercise their malign influence. Space forbids a perfect description of such a life, so full of activity and change; we can but indicate briefly some of its features.

Philip Phillips was born in Chautauqua County, New York, on August 13th, 1834. He was tenth of a family of fifteen children. His father and mother were both staunch members of the Baptist church, and were distinguished for their earnest practical piety. Of his mother, who died one year after the birth of her fifteenth child, and when Philip was under ten years of age, he speaks in words of tender, loving recollection. Her noble teaching and her earnest prayers, are to this day fresh in his mind, and he remembers distinctly her taking him, as she did each of her children, separately to her room and asking God's blessing upon him. Her death was a bitter affliction to the large family of young children, and none felt it more than little Philip.

While yet a mere child, he gave evidence of a rare talent for music and of the possession of a voice of remarkable range and sweetness. His singing even at that early age, was a surprise and a delight to the friends of the family as well as to many others. But, although he seized every opportunity to advance his musical studies, it seemed as though the motherless boy would have to forego his ambition to become a singer and face the battle of life in a more prosaic fashion. Shortly after his mother's death, he was apprenticed to a farmer who engaged to "instruct him in the art of farming and dairying," to clothe him and provide him with food, and send him to school three months in each year. He also covenanted in the indenture to give Philip, at the end of his term of six years, "a new Bible and two suits of clothes; one to be of a common quality and one to be a handsome suit." Philip appears to have fulfilled his part of the agreement to the satisfaction of the farmer; for observing his passion for music, the farmer resolved to gratify it. Returning to the house one evening, Philip found a melodeon in the sitting-room, and on making eager inquiry as to the instrument, he received for answer: "Well, Philip, what is the use of having money if you cannot use it? We have bought this melodeon for you, but you must not neglect your work on account of it." The boy's heart was full to overflowing.

But a much more memorable event in the young man's life than the possession of his first musical instrument was one that occurred soon afterward, when in the course of revival services at Delanti, N.Y., he was converted. The Good Templar movement was about this time attracting public attention, and the young lad entered with energy into the work. His fine voice was in request, and he was invited to assist at the formation of many new lodges. In 1853 he opened his first singing school at Allegheny, N.Y. During the next few years his time was given exclusively to his profession, for he had now fairly embarked on a musical career. He spent some time studying under noted teachers, including Dr. Lowell Mason and others, and in the intervals of other duties, he taught church and school music, and sold musical instruments in New York and Pennsylvania. But above all he preferred work that brought him into active contact with religious services in the churches and elsewhere. His heart was already reaching out with longing to the field that was to be peculiarly his in later years. The first revival work in which he engaged was at the Delanti church, of which he was a member, and of which Rev. A. Wheelock, D.D., was pastor. The services lasted many weeks, and during that time Mr. Phillips presided at the organ and was busy among the awakened souls. An urgent invitation was sent to him, at the conclusion of these engagements, to sing in Ohio. He accepted, and his first service in that State was held in the Baptist church at Marion. Here he met with Miss Olive M. Clark, the lady who afterward became his wife.

Mr. Phillips' first published work, "The Cantata of Esther," was brought out during his Ohio visit. This was followed in 1860 by "Early Blossoms," of which upward of twenty thousand copies were quickly sold. This success encouraged him to settle in Ohio, and he accordingly made his home in Cincinnati, and established the music publishing firm of Philip Phillips & Co., in that city. He next brought out "Musical Leaves," which reached a circulation of 700,000 copies. Then

SISTERS OF CHARITY.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: "This woman was full of good works and alms-deeds which she did." Acts 9: 36.

STARTING now where I left off last Sabbath in reciting woman's opportunities, I have to say that woman has the special and superlative right of blessing and comforting the sick. What land, what street, what house, has not felt the smitings of disease? Tens of thousands of sick-beds! What shall we do with them? Shall man, with his rough hand and heavy foot, and impatient bearing, minister? No. He cannot soothe the pain. He cannot quiet the nerves. He knows not where to set the light. His hand is not steady enough to pour out the drops. He is not wakeful enough to be a watcher. The Lord God who sent Miss Dix into the Virginia hospitals, and the Maid of Saragossa to appease the wounds of the battle-field, has equipped wife, mother and daughter, for this delicate but tremendous mission. You have known men who have despised woman, but the moment disease fell upon them they did not send for their friends at the bank, or their partner in business, or their worldly associates; their first cry was, "Take me to my wife." The dissipated young man at the college scoffs at the idea of being under home influences; but at the first blast of the typhoid fever on his cheek, he says: "Where is mother?" Walter Scott wrote partly in satire and partly in compliment when he said:

> O woman, in our hour of ease,
> Uncertain, coy and hard to please;
> When pain and anguish wring the brow,
> A ministering angel thou.

I think the most pathetic passage in all the Bible is the description of the lad who went out to the harvest-field of Shunem and got sunstruck—throwing his hands on his temples and crying out: "O, my head! my head!" and they said: "Carry him to his mother." And then the record is: "He sat on her knees till noon, and then died." It is an awful thing to be ill away from home in a strange hotel, once in a while men coming to look at you, holding their hand over their mouth for fear that they will catch the contagion. How roughly they turn you in bed! How loudly they talk! How you long for the ministries of home! I knew one such who went away from one of the brightest of homes for several weeks' business absence at the West. A telegram came at midnight that he was on his death-bed, far away from home. By express train the wife and daughters went westward; but they went too late. He feared not to die; but he was in an agony to live until his family got there. He tried to bribe the doctor to make him live a little while longer. "He said: "I am willing to die, but not alone." But the pulses fluttered the eyes closed, and the heart stopped. The express trains met in the midnight: wife and daughters going westward! lifeless remains of husband and father coming eastward. Oh, it was a sad, pitiful, overwhelming spectacle! When we are sick we want to be sick at home. When the time comes for us to die we want to die at home. The room may be very humble, and the faces that look into ours may be be very plain; but who cares for that? Loving hands to bathe the temples. Loving voices to speak good cheer. Loving lips to read the comforting promises of Jesus.

In our last dreadful war, men cast the cannon; men fashioned the musketry; men cried to the hosts, "Forward, march!" men hurled their battalions on the sharp edges of the enemy, crying: "Charge! charge!" but woman scraped the lint; woman administered the cordials; woman watched by the dying couch; woman wrote the last message to the home circle; woman wept at the solitary burial attended by herself and four men with a spade. We greeted the general home with brass bands and triumphal arches, and wild huzzas; but the story is too good to be written anywhere, save in the chronicles of heaven, of Mrs. Brady, who came down among the sick in the swamps of the Chickahominy; of Annie Ross, in the cooper-shop hospital; of Margaret Breckinridge, who came to men who had been for weeks with their wounds undressed—some of them frozen to the ground; and when she turned them over, those that had an arm left, waved it and filled the air with their "hurrah!"—of Mrs. Hodge, who came from Chicago with blankets and with pillows, until the men shouted: "Three cheers for the Christian Commission! God bless the women at home;" then sitting down to take the last message: "Tell my wife not to fret about me, but to meet me in heaven; tell her to train up the boys whom we have loved so well; tell her we shall meet again in the good land; tell her to bear my loss like the Christian wife of a Christian soldier;" and of Mrs. Shelton, into whose face the convalescent soldier looked and said: "Your grapes and cologne cured me." Men did their work with shot and shell, and carbine and howitzer; women did their work with socks, and slippers, and bandages, and warm drinks, and Scripture texts, and gentle strokings of the hot temples, and stories of that land where they never have any pain. Men knelt down over the wounded and said: "On which side did you fight?" Women knelt down over the wounded and said: "Where are you hurt? What nice thing can I make for you to eat? What makes you cry?" To-night, while we men are sound asleep in our beds, there will be a light in yonder loft; there will be groaning in that dark alley; there will be cries of distress in that cellar. Men will sleep, and women will watch.

Again: woman has a superlative right to take care of the poor. There are hundreds and thousands of them in all our cities. There is a kind of work that men cannot do for the poor. Here comes a group of little bare-foot children to the door of the Dorcas Society. They need to be clothed and provided for. Which of these directors of banks would know how many yards it would take to make that little girl a dress? Which of these masculine hands could fit a hat to that little girl's head? Which of the wise men would know how to tie on that new pair of shoes? Man sometimes gives his charity in a rough way, and it falls like the fruit of a tree in the East, which fruit comes down so heavily that it breaks the skull of the man who is trying to gather it. But woman glides so softly into the house of destitution, and finds out all the sorrows of the place, and puts so quietly the donation on the table, that all the family come out on the front steps as she departs, expecting that from under her shawl she will thrust out two wings and go right up toward heaven, from whence she seems to have come down. Oh, Christian young woman! if you would make yourself happy and win the blessing of Christ, go out among the destitute. A loaf of bread or a bundle of socks may make a homely load to carry; but the angels of God will come out to watch, and the Lord Almighty will give his messenger hosts a charge, saying: "Look after that woman. Canopy her with your wings and shelter her from all harm;" and while you are seated in the house of destitution and suffering, the little ones around the room will whisper: "Who is she? Ain't she beautiful?" and if you listen right sharply, you will hear dripping down the leaky roof, and rolling over the rotten stairs, the angel chant that shook Bethlehem: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men." Can you tell me why a Christian woman, going down among the haunts of iniquity on a Christian errand, never meets with any indignity? I stood in the chapel of Helen Chalmers, the daughter of the celebrated Dr. Chalmers, in the most abandoned part of the City of Edinburgh; and I said to her as I looked around upon the fearful surroundings of that place: "Do you come here nights to hold service?" "Oh, yes," she said. "Can it be possible that you never meet with an insult while performing this Christian errand?" "Never," she said—"never." That young woman who has her father by her side walking down the street, and armed policeman at each corner of the street, is not so well defended as that Christian who goes forth on Gospel work into the haunts of iniquity, carrying the Bibles and bread. God, with the right arm of his wrath omnipotent, would tear to pieces anyone who should offer indignity. He would smite him with lightnings, and drown him with floods, and swallow him with earthquakes, and damn him with eternal indignations. Some one said: "I dislike very much to see that Christian woman teaching those bad boys in the mission school. I am afraid to have her instruct them." "So," said another man, "I am afraid, too." Said the first: "I am afraid they will use vile language before they leave the place." "Ah," said the other man, "I am not afraid of that. What I am afraid of is, that if any of those boys should use a bad word in that presence, the other boys would tear him to pieces and kill him on the spot." That woman is the best sheltered who is sheltered by Omnipotence, and it is always safe to go where God tells you to go. It seems as if the Lord had ordained woman for an especial work in the solicitation of charities. Backed up by barrels in which there is no flour, and by stoves in which there is no fire, and wardrobes in which there are no clothes, a woman is irresistible; passing on her errand, God says to her: "You go into that bank, or store, or shop, and get the money." She goes in and gets it. The man is hard-fisted, but she gets it. She could not help but get it. It is decreed from eternity she should get it. No need of your turning your back and pretending you don't hear; you do hear. There is no need of your saying you are begged to death. There is no need of your wasting your time, and you might as well submit first as last. You had better right away take down your check-book, mark the number of the check, fill up the blank, sign your name, and hand it to her. There is no need of wasting time. Those poor children on the back street have been hungry long enough. That sick man must have some farina. That consumptive must have something to ease his cough. I meet this delegate of a relief society coming out of the store of such a hard-fisted man, and I say, "Did you get the money?" "Of course," she says; "I got the money; that's what I went for. The Lord told me to go in and get it, and he never sends me on a fo errand."

Again: I have to tell you that it woman's specific right to comfort un the stress of dire disaster. She is ca the weaker vessel; but all profane as as sacred history attests that when the sis comes she is better prepared than m to meet the emergency. How often have seen a woman who seemed to be a ciple of frivolity and indolence, who, u one stroke of calamity, changed to a h ine. Oh, what a great mistake those b ness men make who never tell their b ness troubles to their wives! There co some great loss to their store, or som their companions in business play the a sad trick, and they carry the burder l alone. Oh, sir! your first duty was to tell wife all about it. She, perhaps, m not have disentangled your finances, o tended your credit, but she would helped you to bear misfortune. You h no right to carry on one shoulder a which is intended for two. There are l ness men who know what I mean. T comes a crisis in your affairs. You s gle bravely and long; but after a there comes a day when you say: "H shall have to stop," and you call in partners, and you call in the most p nent men in your employ, and you "We have to stop." You leave the suddenly. You can scarcely make up mind to pass through the street and ov bridge or on the ferry-boat. You feel e body will be looking at you, and bla you, and denouncing you. You h home. You tell your wife all about t fair. What does she say? Does she the butterfly? Does she talk abou silks, and the ribbons, and the fash No. She comes up to the emergency. quails not under the stroke. She help to begin to plan right away. The will be a Thermopylæ in your own hous old, where God will tell you to stand. ere are hundreds of households where as ch courage is demanded of woman as w exhibited by Grace Darling, or Marie toi nette, or Joan of Arc.

Woman is further endowed to bri us into the kingdom of heaven. It is ster for a woman to be a Christian than a man. Why? You say she is weaker. No. Her heart is more responsive to the ad ings of divine love. The fact that sh can more easily become a Christian, I pr the statement that three-fourths members of the churches in all Ch dom are women. So God appoints th be the chief agencies for bringing this back to God. The greatest sermo are not preached on celebrated platforms they are preached with an audience of th or three and in private home-life. A pleasant, loving, Christian demeanor in the pr ce transgression, in the presence of hard-ss, in the presence of obduracy and crime, an argument from the force of which no an can escape.

Lastly, one of the specific rights of wo-an is, through the grace of Christ, final- to reach heaven. Oh, what a multitude women in heaven! Mary, Christ's other, in heaven; Elizabeth Fry in heav-; Charlotte Elizabeth in heaven; the other of Augustine in heaven; the Coun-ss of Huntingdon—who sold her splendid wels to build chapels—in heaven; while great many others who have never been ard of on earth, or known but little, have ne to the rest and peace of heaven. What rest! What a change it was from the all room, with no fire and one window, e glass broken out, and the aching side, d worn-out eyes, to the "house of many nsions!" No more stitching until elve o'clock at night, no more thrusting the thumb by the employer through the rk to show that it was not done quite ht. Plenty of bread at last. Heaven for ning heads. Heaven for broken hearts. aven for anguish-bitten frames. No re sitting up until midnight for the com- of staggering steps. No more rough ws across the temples. No more sharp, en, bitter curses. Some of you will have rest in this world. It will be toil, and uggle, and suffering all the way up. You ll have to stand at your door fighting ck the wolf with your own hand, red th carnage. But God has a crown for ju. I want you to realize that he is now iking it, and whenever you weep a tear, sets another gem in that crown; when-er you have a pang of body or soul, he its another gem in that crown, until, after hile, in all the tiara there will be no room another splendor, and God will say to angel: "The crown is done; let her up t she may wear it." And as the Lord Righteousness puts the crown upon your w, angel will cry to angel, "Who is ?" and Christ will say: "I will tell you o she is. She is the one that came up of great tribulation, and had her robe shed and made white in the blood of the mb." And then God will spread a ban-t, and he will invite all the principalities eaven to sit at the feast; and the tables ll blush with the best clusters from the eyards of God, and crimson with the lve manner of fruits from the Tree of e, and waters from the fountain of the k will flash from the golden tankards; l the old harpers of heaven will sit there, rking music with their harps; and Christ l point you out, amid the celebrities of aven, saying: "She suffered with me on th, now we are going to be glorified to-ther." And the banqueters, no longer e to hold their peace, will break forth h congratulation: "Hail! Hail!" And re will be handwritings on the wall—not h as struck the Persian noblemen with ror, but with fire-tipped fingers, writing blazing capitals of light and love and tory: "God has wiped away all tears m all faces."

THE SAVIOUR PLEADING.

"Come unto me." Matt. 11: 28.

(Written for The Christian Herald.)

GIVE Me thy heart to-day,
Weary and faint and sore,
Turn thou from sin away,
Now and forevermore.
Come, for the feast is spread,
Come to the Living Bread,
Here shall thy soul be fed,
Come unto Me.

Give Me thy will to-day,
And thou henceforth shalt be Guided by love divine,
Ever unerringly.
Then shall thy doubting cease,
Thou shalt have perfect peace,
Wisdom and light increase,
Come unto Me.

Give Me thyself to-day,
Body and soul and mind,
Forsake the things of clay,
The better life to find.
Then like the shining light,
Thy path shall grow more bright,
Until thy faith is sight,
Come unto Me.

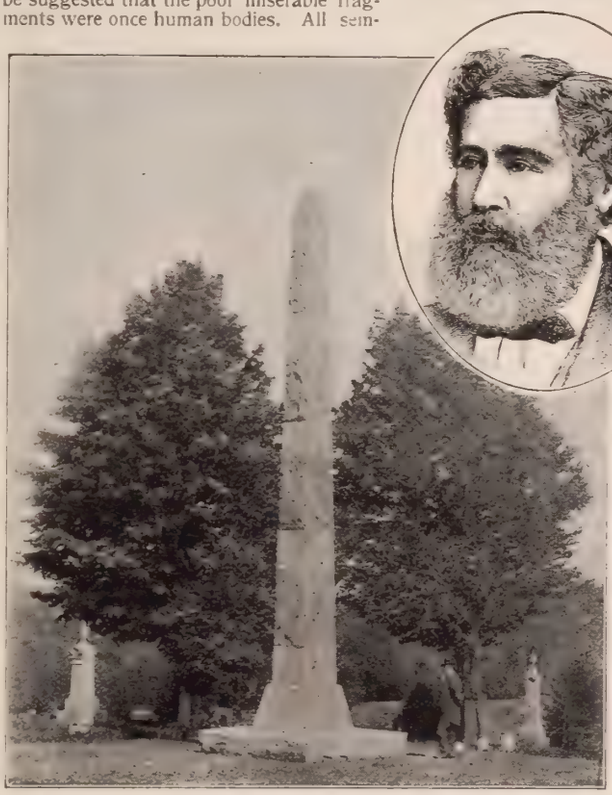
Ashtabula's Memorial.

An Elegant Shaft Erected and Dedicated to the Memory of Mr. and Mrs. P. P. Bliss and others who Perished in the Great Railroad Disaster Nineteen Years ago.

PROFOUNDLY significant, suggestive of tender solemn memories is the beautiful monument just dedicated, of which a picture appears on this page. It has been erected at Ashtabula, O., on the ground where the remains of the unrecognized dead were buried after the appalling railroad disaster of Dec. 29, 1876. There are twenty-two graves in that plot of land, and it is supposed that the remains of forty-six bodies were buried in them, but the nature of the terrible calamity will always preclude certainty. When the fire that consumed the wrecked train had done its awful work it had effectually destroyed all features by which the dead could be recognized, and only by the shocking knowledge of what had occurred, could the idea be suggested that the poor miserable fragments were once human bodies. All semblance of humanity was gone. The poor satisfaction that bereaved friends derive from giving to the inanimate clay, loving attention and solemn burial, was denied to relatives of the victims in that sad sepulture. One charred figure was so like another in ghastly horror that none could know which was the one that had been dear and had given love for love. They were all buried indiscriminately and the friends and relatives could only set up tablets bearing the record that treasured dust was buried there. But human love craves a more explicit memorial and the shaft of which we give a picture has been raised to gratify the desire. Mr. T. W. McCreary of Ashtabula was the originator of the project and it is mainly due to his efforts that the shaft has been raised.



THE ASHTABULA MEMORIAL, DEDICATED MAY 30—MR. P. P. BLISS.

Every one who had lost a friend or relative in the horrible holocaust, had the opportunity to contribute, and there were many. The amount subscribed was $1150, and with this an obelisk thirty-one feet high was bought and set up as a memorial of the beloved dead. The ceremony of dedication was appropriately performed on Decoration Day, when the thoughts of the nation turn naturally to the memory of those who have gone before. Three survivors of the disaster were present at the exercises, and were the heroes of the day. These were the conductor of the train, a brakeman, and a man who on the day of the catastrophe was acting as newsboy. They told how on the fatal day the train slowed up on reaching the bridge which crossed the ravine at a height of seventy feet. There were deep drifts of snow, a high wind was blowing, and it was eight o'clock on a nasty winter night. The train with its regular crew and 138 passengers spread itself on the single-span bridge only 150 feet long. Then there was a crash, a sensation of falling into bottomless space, and then the crushing, grinding horror of striking the rocks at the bed of the river. The forward car was under water, and piled above it were the hinder cars with their human freight. Each crushed in the roof of the one ahead of it, and the heavy trucks in many cases rested on something soft which had once been a human form. The bridge having broken near the centre, the cars had fallen end ways, and the passengers were shot as from a catapult out of their seats and rolled down the aisles. Then a new horror was added to the fate of drowning, which had overtaken the passengers of the forward car. The hinder cars were above the surface of the shallow river, a mere heap of splintered wood and bent metal. The live coals from the stoves wers sent flying through the cars, and the oil from the broken lamps added its share to the combustible material. Soon the cars above the level of the river were burning furiously, and every inmate who had not made his escape was doomed. Some sixty odd passengers and trainmen had crawled out of the wreck, only one of the number unhurt. All the others were more or less injured, and in the wreck were over ninety persons, some crushed and under water, some dead, but some living, held firmly by the super-incumbent weight of the shattered cars. These were burned to death before they could be rescued.

Among the lost in the terrible disaster was a man dear to the Christian world. P. P. Bliss, the sweet singer and composer, author of "Hold the Fort," "Dare to be a Daniel," and other thrilling Gospel melodies was with his wife in the train on his way to Chicago to assist Mr. Moody, Major Whittle and others in special services. In the first crash, Mr. Bliss (whose portrait we give) is said to have escaped unhurt, but his wife was caught and held by the beams of the cars. Mr. Bliss set to work to extricate her and was by her side when the flames reached them. They were among the unrecognized dead, and their intimate and loving friend, Mr. Ira D. Sankey, was prominent among the contributors to the memorial which covered remains very dear to him.

The exercises at the dedication of the monument attracted an immense audience. Mr. Lucien Seymour, of the Monument Committee, gave the signal in a bright, sympathetic speech, for the removal of the flags which hid the monument from view, and as the ropes were pulled and the beautiful proportions of the lofty shaft were disclosed, there went up a great cheer from a multitude of throats. An eager crowd surged around its base, reading the sad record cut there of the names of the dead who were known to be in the disaster, but whose bodies could not be recognized. As soon as order was restored, Mr. H. A. Garfield, a son of the late President, was introduced, and made a lengthy speech, referring to the erection of the monument and the memories of the war recalled by the ceremonies of Decoration Day.

OUR CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

IV.—MRS. DAY AND MRS. HUNTER.

UNITED in a loving fellowship of service, the two ladies whose portraits we give have found a bond of union that their past lives would never have suggested. Some forty years ago each was brought into close contact with the institution which was destroyed by the great conflict that deluged the land with blood. But they were in contact with it on opposite sides. Mrs. Day was the wife of a slave-owner, and Mrs. Hunter of an ardent abolitionist. The one was working with the negroes to improve their condition, and the other was actively engaged in the dangerous business of helping the individual slaves to escape to Canada. After the war they drifted by the attraction of the natural, or rather supernatural, love for Christ and humanity, which glowed in each heart, into a fellowship that has proved a blessing to slaves in a worse bondage than that of the Southern plantation.

TWO PRISON-WORKERS OF OGDEN, UTAH.

About five years ago these two Christian ladies settled in Ogden, Utah, and looked around for opportunities of service. It was out of their power to endow institutions or organize philanthropic schemes for the relief of the indigent, but they could give themselves, and they had the secret of the Lord to impart to hearts which were burdened and lives that were dark. Each desired to spend and be spent in Christ's service. It was not an attractive field that they entered; but it was a field where the service they could render was sorely needed. They went to the city prison. What they found there would have appalled some women. But the very evil which filled the cells was precisely the evil for which they carried the antidote. As the physician goes to the hospital to exercise his beneficent vocation, Mrs. Day and Mrs. Hunter went to the prison to tell the sinful and the fallen of the way to purity and peace. They easily obtained permission to talk with the prisoners and hold a simple service. Their motive could not be misunderstood by prisoners or officials. The unhappy prisoners could not resist a tenderness which came to them as outcasts, and kindness which was shown to them in disgrace. Every Sunday afternoon those gentle women were at their post, going from cell to cell, listening to stories of crime and trying to inspire penitence and hope in stubborn hearts. Jesus, the Saviour of sinners, was the burden of their talk and in unbounded confidence in his power to redeem the vilest, they persevered in their self-imposed labor. How much of disappointment they suffered they never tell, but they tell with joy of the triumphs that Christ has achieved in that dreary place.

During the other days of the week, Mrs. Day and Mrs. Hunter are busy in other fields. There are many poor and sick and sorrowing in Ogden, as there are in other cities, and those are the conditisns these Christian ladies recognize as their special sphere. As their work was seen, its value was perceived and appreciated. The means of giving relief was intrusted to them by persons who desired to co-operate with them and the ladies have thus been enabled to give substantial help, in addition to spiritual ministration. Out of their efforts has now grown a women's refuge for the fallen which is under the charge of a member of the Salvation Army, and not long ago a school was organized which is now flourishing in a quarter where it is solely needed. Neither for their prison work nor for their city labors do either of the ladies receive any compensation. It is to them its own reward and they know that their Master sees and approves.

THE TEN COMMANDMENTS.

S. S. Lesson for July 7. Exod. 20: 1-17. Golden Text Luke 10: 27. By Mrs. Baxter.

JESUS Christ endorsed the rendering of the ten commandments by the lawyer of Luke 10, according to Deut. 6: 5, 2; Lev. 19: 13: "Thou hast answered right; this do and thou shalt live." But when the holy presence of the only man who had this law within his heart searched his uneasy conscience, the would-be inquirer, by his very question: "And who is my neighbor?" manifested a spirit which sought to reduce to terms that law which God promised to be hid in our hearts that we may not sin against him.

Man Had Been Without Law, and yet even without law, there was every opportunity to please God. An Abel had obtained witness that he was righteous God testifying of his gifts (Heb. 11: 5); an Enoch and a Noah had walked with God, and an Abraham had won for himself the title, "the friend of God" (Isa. 41: 8) before the giving of the law. When the very heathen, which have no law, do by nature the things of the law, they, having no law, are a law unto themselves; in that they show the work of the law written in their hearts, "their conscience bearing witness therewith" (Rom. 2: 14, 15). But if a man can please God without the law, what purpose does the law serve? "It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise had been made."

As an effect of sin contaminating increasingly from generation to generation, the edge of man's conscience wore off more and more. Possessing no standard by which to compare himself, it became easier to sin; the law written in the human heart by the nature which God gave to him, became overpowered by evil associations, and an outward restraint was needed, "a schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ that we might be justified by faith" (Gal. 3: 24). Have we not all, from time to time, been startled into the knowledge of sin in our hearts and lives, by hearing that mentioned as sin, which we have never previously done with an evil conscience? And have we not experienced that the very condemnation of it by others led us to recognize it as sin, and ourselves as sinners? This then is the use of the law.

The circumstances of the giving of the law were of the most solemn kind. God spoke first as a Father, before he took the character of a Judge. Appealing to the people by his deliverance of them from Egypt, and his bearing them "on eagle's wings," and bringing them to himself, he says: "Now, therefore, my voice in deed, and keep my covenant, ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me from among all peoples; for all the earth is mine. Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests and a holy people" (Exod. 19: 4-6). God's first purpose when he made man in his own image, after his likeness, shines forth in these wondrous words. It was a call for "a people for his name." But, alas, in spite of the response of the people: "All that the Lord hath spoken we will do" (Exod. 10: 8), their subsequent history proved that their hearts were not won, they were a self-respecting and stiff-necked people still. The Christian church has followed in the wake of the Jewish, "All seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's (Phil. 2: 21), and only the overcomer the exceptions in the churches (Rev. 2 and 3), will inherit this promise and become the "peculiar treasure," the pearl of great price, which the Lord is coming very soon to take away to [illegible] him purifieth himself even as he is pure" (1. John 3: 3). Only those thus purified will be taken and others will be left (Matt. 24: 40).

In his holy law, God must be the first, it is but becoming that a Father, a King, a God, should assert and establish his authority. "I am the first and I am the last." (Isa 54: 6.) Thou shalt have none other Gods beside me. (Exod. 20: 3.) Nobody, nothing, no consideration must take precedence of God: This is the first and almost inclusive law. David understood it when he said, I have set the Lord always before me. (Ps. 16: 8.) The psalmist King would not do or speak anything which had not first its reference to God. This commandment includes the second. Thou shalt not make, in order that thou mayest not worship, any image or likeness of God. Be satisfied with we walk by faith, not by sight. Sense clamors for something to gratify the sight, or the hearing, something to stir the emotions. God calls for holy stillness: "Be still and know that I am God. (Ps. 46: 10.) It is not in the beauty of music, in the wonders of art, in all which can move and gratify or work upon the senses, that God draws near and reveals himself. It is to a broken, crushed, speechless heart which has learned its nothingness, which has nothing to bring, nothing to be, nothing to do which can propitiate him, that he raises from the dunghill, and sets among his princes.

"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." The language of the irreverent reprobate, who strengthens the lost power of his own word, by introducing into his conversation the name of the Most High, is not the only way of breaking the commandment. True, the swearer in his impious daring assumes to make servile to his wicked purposes the name before which heaven bows. But he knows not what he does; his ignorance equals his sin. But when a child of God prays a prayer, supposed to be a real transaction with the Most High, and yet afterwards feels and acts as though nothing had transpired between him and his God, his sin exceeds that of the unconverted, godless swearer; he has taken in vain the name of his reconciled God—he has broken the third commandment. All unreality in religion, all highly spiritual language, which is not born out of life, breaks the spirit of the third commandment.

"Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath day." By universal custom, the first day of the week commemorative of our Lord's resurrection, has been substituted for the seventh day, which was commanded under the old Jewish law, and which is still kept holy by pious Jews. "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is a sabbath unto the Lord thy God." The day is not ours, but his. We cannot too often read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest, the well known passage from Isa 48: 13, 14: "If thou turn away thy foot on the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable; and shalt honor it [R.V.] not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words, then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord . . . for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." The essence of the commandments is: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God."

We turn to the remaining six. We can only keep these as we habitually keep the first four. If we love God, he teaches us to love man with his love. "Honor thy father and mother;" learn from earliest infancy that to obey God thou must obey those whom he has set over thee. Blessed are those parents who have taught their children to obey while yet young, on the ground of the fear of God. Blessed are those children who have formed the habit of obedience from their earliest years. The last five commandments are all comprehended in the words: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Christ extends this command and adds: "Even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another" (John 13: 34). Not murder only, but the angry spirit, the hatred, envy, jealousy, which lead to it, cannot exist where there is love. "He that loveth his neighbor hath fulfilled the law." "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor, therefore love is the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. 13: 8, 10).

MT. SINAI AND THE PLAIN OF ENCAMPMENT.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

RESUMING after a year the study of the Old Testament, the history is taken up at the foot of Mount Sinai. The last lesson of the series was the crossing of the Red Sea. By referring to the map of "the countries between Egypt and Canaan," in the Teachers' Bible, it will be seen that the direct route to Canaan lay across the northern part of a triangular peninsula, along the coast of the Mediterranean. But this route would have led them into the country of the Amalekites, which lay to the south of Canaan. Moses had on his hands a numerous host. There were, it is stated, six hundred and three thousand five hundred and fifty men, beside probably a still greater number of women and the children under twenty years of age who were not counted. They were only just emancipated from slavery, which, as it had continued for several generations, must have produced a degeneration, which rendered them unfit to force a passage through the country of a warlike people like the Amalekites, to say nothing of undertaking the conquest of Canaan. It must also have developed in them a spirit of dependence and childish wilfulness that would render them difficult to manage and to lead. They had told Moses to let them alone to serve the Egyptians, and they were far from enthusiastic as to the result of the enterprise, or loyal to Moses in his leadership. A preliminary season of discipline and organization was necessary before any decisive step wa taken. Their deliverance had been marvelou and impressive, but now the work of moul ing a mere mob into a nation must be unde taken. How stupendous this was, we ca not easily realize. The story of the difficu ties the French people encountered a centur ago when they undertook to make a ne constitution for the nation, shows how dif cult it is to reconstruct the social and poli cal fabric from the foundation; and in t case of this newly emancipated people wit out a home or a foot of land to call the own, needing food and water every da the difficulty would be infinitely greate They must have a season of retireme and rest before entering on their gigan task. They were led out of their course ; most at right angles, southward. Abo seven weeks after leaving Egypt they e camped at the foot of the mountain Sinai. If the identificatisn now generai accepted is correct, they were about o hundred and fifty miles from the scene their deliverance. The journey had n been accomplished without trouble. Th feared that hunger and thirst would k them. There was murmuring and disc tent. They were fast losing confidence Moses, and even when food and wa were assured, they were still in doubt. Th came the giving of the law, the subject the lesson. The nation was to be org ized on a foundation of righteousness. Th is the cardinal principle of the whole hist of the nation. So long as they did wh was right they would be protected a prosper; when they did not do right th would be punished. No stress is laid culture or wealth, but everything turns righteousness. These ten commandme furnish the key to the entire history of nation. Stern ethical right is the one tou stone. The code is of the simplest a most elementary kind, but it is capable immense development. No code in e tence is so brief, yet so comprehensive. opens with a definition and declaration God's right. He has delivered them ; he is their God, with the right to legisl That statement is the basis of all that lows, and that principle acknowledged, else is plain. The people are not to m an image of him, and they are to vener him and hold his name sacred. One s enth of their time is to be rescued fr secular labor. Then follow laws regulat their conduct to each other and to soci Each is sound and comprehensive, and last goes deeper than conduct, and forb tneir cherishing in their hearts a desire wh they ought not to gratify. Never was clear cut and effective a law compressed to so small a compass. Even now, v all our progress and culture, and after m than three thousand years, this code is basis of all intelligent legislation.

Thou shalt have no other gods. It has b said that this age keeps that commandn better than any of the other nine. Man the people of this time are not disposed have other gods, and, indeed, would be if there were no God at all. But rightly derstood, the commandment is broken as often as of old. Whoever loves honors anything more than God, bre the commandment. An earnest preac had in his congregation a lady who very charitable, and estimable in all wa but she was not a Christian. The preac pleaded with her and prayed for her; something kept her back. At last the cret came out. She was passionately f of card-playing, and feared that she w have to give it up if she became a Chr tian. The clergyman said to her, "B surely you would give up anything that would keep you out of heaven? If you knew that cards would do that, you w give them up?" The lady shook her h "I am so fond of them I could not give t up for anything." "Then," said the cle man, "they are your God, and to them must look for salvation."

A WISE HINDU RAJAH'S RULE.

Ramnad's Prince, the Friend of Christian Missions—His Efforts to Educate His People—How an Indian State is Governed.

IN a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, an interesting account was presented of the progress of Gospel work in Madura, India. Rev. T. S. Taylor, the writer of the article, is pastor of the East Gate Church, Madura, and is a veteran missionary in the Indian field. Another entertaining contribution from his pen, given below, furnishes an attractive and accurate description of one of the great Indian native princes who, though a Hindu, has openly shown himself to be the friend of the Christian missionaries—the Rajah of Ramnad. Mr. Taylor writes:

THE RAJAH OF RAMNAD.

Ramnad is the largest Zemindary in the Madura district. Ramnad, the capital, is thirty-three miles from the sea, and has a population of 13,719. It has many picturesque buildings. Kamalinga Vilas, or the Durbar Hall, was most magnificently adorned by the present Rajah. The palace presents a very delightful scene every evening between 5 and 8 P. M., when the Rajah himself mixes freely with the local officials and non-officials, and engages in a variety of pleasant amusements, and occasionally in highly-edifying debates. Within the fort, the majority of the inhabitants are Maravars and Kallalars, who depend upon the palace for their livelihood. There is a neat Protestant church near the palace. There are several large "rest-houses," at of which—called Lakshmipuram Choltry—the Rajahs and Ranies frequently halt here on their way to Rameshwaram.

Rameshwaram (the "hero-god") is a low, sandy island at the extremity of Adam's bridge, extending east and west between Ceylon and southeastern coast of the peninsula. The great temple of Ramanagaswamy stands on an elevation in the northern part of the island, and near the Thanoosheoty teertan ("sacred water"). Great wealth has been lavished on it by the Rajah. The temple buildings are surrounded by a high wall. The edifice, with its ceremonies and its attendant Brahmins, is maintained by the revenue of fifty-seven villages, granted by former Rajahs. It is still visited daily by scores of pilgrims from all parts of India, who come through Ramnad to the crossing, and at certain seasons by hundreds and even thousands. More come from Napand and north of the Ganges than from the Tamil districts in the immediate vicinity; the Deccan and Mysore and Travancore contributing the majority. One of the great occasions is the Mahodaya Festival, which is termed "Ardhodaya" when falling on a Sunday, and "Mahodaya" if on a Monday. Large numbers of pilgrims come to bathe, and when that ceremonial is over, walk back the whole distance of eighteen miles. There is a Tamil proverb: "Though he went on a pilgrimage to Rameshwaram, Saturn has not left him," (meaning: "He is still unlucky.")

In November, 1889, Sri Rajah Muthuvijaya, Raghunatha Bhashkara Setupati was installed as Rajah of Ramnad. During his minority, he was carefully educated by Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Zilva, of the American Madura Mission. He was the first of the native nobles in charge of the court of wards to choose for himself his place of education, and this was the Christian College in Madras. He received a regular course of education, and is an accomplished speaker in English. During his student life at the Christian College under Dr. Miller, he learned to appreciate Christianity. The young Rajah has already distinguished himself in many different ways. Especially is he a friend of education, and has already established a high school and a lower secondary school, with excellent results. He dismissed all dancing girls from the palace temple and substituted instead a male soloist, a violin player, and a drummer to perform during the ceremonies. When cholera raged in the town and its vicinity, invaluable help was rendered by the Rajah. Special doctors were appointed, and medical dispensaries were established at proper quarters. He even made the gateways of his palace temporary hospitals, which large numbers of persons thronged every day. He has also directed several lakhs of rupees to be distributed among various Hindu charities, and has been very liberal towards the work of the American Missionaries in Madura. He is in favor of liberal ideas, though he still clings to his Hinduism. The Lord said to King Solomon, "I have given thee a wise and an understanding heart." We ask our Western brethren to pray with us for the Rajah, that he may yet become a Christian.

TRADITIONAL TOMB OF LAZARUS.

In a recent issue of the German Palestine Society's Journal, Prof. Gelzer, of Jena, discusses an interesting tombstone discovered at Cesarea, in Palestine, and first published in the "Revue Biblique," printed at Jerusalem. The inscription reads: "Monument belonging to (or dedicated to) Mary and Lazarus." The language is Greek, and the inscription dates from the fourth or fifth century. The original editors, the Dominicans of Jerusalem, thought that it was merely a monument of two persons by the names of Mary and Lazarus. Gelzer, however, is of the opinion that the Biblical persons of these names were intended. He draws attention to the fact that in the second half of the fourth and in the first half of the fifth centuries the discovery of Apostles' and Prophets' tombs was "a flourishing and manifestly also a lucrative branch of industry." At that period it was claimed that the bodies of Joseph, Samuel, Zachariah, John the Baptist, and other Biblical men were found, and many of these so-called relics were transported to the then capital of Christendom, Constantinople.

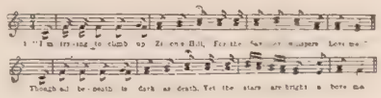
appeared the "Singing Pilgrim," founded on John Bunyan's inimitable allegory. The book was enthusiastically received, and Mr. Phillips acquired by the authorship of this work the name of "The Singing Pilgrim," by which he is known the world over. Besides his ordinary professional engagements and his literary labors, he sang gratuitously in Sunday Schools, in soldier's hospitals and in connection with the United States



From "The Climbing of Zion's Hill," by Mr. Phillips.

Christian Commission. On a notable occasion, when he sang before the Christian Commission in Washington, D. C., there were present most of the chief officers of the national government, including the President, Abraham Lincoln, Secretary William H. Seward, Edwin M. Stanton, Schuyler Colfax, James G. Blaine, James A. Garfield, Generals Howard and Hancock. Salmon P. Chase, Bishop Simpson, General Fiske, and nearly all the members of Congress were also among those who attended. After Mr. Phillips had sung the song, "Your Mission," the following written request was handed to the chairman, William H. Seward:

"Near the close let us have 'Your Mission' repeated by Mr. Phillips—Don't say I called for it.
LINCOLN."

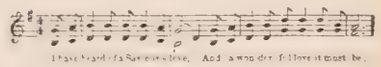
This incident was, in a certain sense, the turning point in Mr. Phillips' public career. He awoke next morning literally to find himself famous, for the incident was published in the daily newspapers of all the great cities throughout the Union. The result was a demand from many quarters to hear the Gospel singer whom the President had so honored.

In 1865 all Mr. Phillips' property was destroyed by fire. Yet even this misfortune, like many other events in his life, seemed to be providentially turned to blessing. Detatched from commercial pursuits, he gave himself unreservedly to the Lord's work, and in that work held himself ready to go wherever he might be called. In 1865 he came with his family to New York, and the next two years were passed in the preparation of a collection of hymns for the use of the Methodist Episcopal church, and in numerous religious services. In 1868 he visited Great Britain and sang by invitation at Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle and other large churches, and at the Temperance Convention in the Crystal Palace. Four years later he again visited that country and then gave one hundred and fifty services for the benefit of the Continental Sunday School Union Fund. Coming back to America he crossed the Continent, and, making San Francisco his headquarters, he went from place to place, returning to San Francisco each week for his Sunday services. He labored in connection with Mr. Moody, then preaching on the Pacific coast. Tours followed in the West and South.

Mr. Phillips sailed with his family from San Francisco, March 8, 1875, on a trip around the world. Three years were passed amid constantly changing scenes and circumstances. The first halt was at the Sandwich Islands. The vessel remained in port only twenty hours, but during that time a service was arranged by the missionaries. Thence the voyagers sailed for New Zealand, where a short stay of eight hours was made, and a service of song was held. Melbourne, Australia, was the next city visited; then Ballarat, Creswick, Geelong, Castlemaine, Sydney and other large cities.

On reaching Ceylon, the visitors were entertained by missionaries. Here three hundred people gathered for a song service. Three days' sail brought the travelers to Madras where a Sunday was spent to the mutual pleasure of singer and hearers. At Calcutta, Rev. J. M. Thoburn, and other old friends in the American Missionary Home, extended a cordial welcome to the visitors, and arrangements were made for a singing campaign in India which was a triumphant spiritual success.

From India the party set out for the Holy Land; where Mr. Phillips made an extended tour, singing in Jerusalem, Joppa, Nazareth, and other places. From Palestine his route lay through Egypt, thence to Italy, and Austria, Germany and Holland, and so to Great Britain. He spent over four months on the Continent of Europe, holding services in nearly all the large cities. Many of those services were given gratuitously. He found that many of his songs had preceded him, and that his audiences, using a foreign tongue, could join in the strains which had already become familiar to thousands in America and England. In Amsterdam he contributed seventy-five evangelistic services during the session of the World's Fair held there. At those meetings 170 sought and professed Christ. In England he tarried long enough to give over two hundred services of song. At one great temperance meeting there were present over 40,000 people.



From his "Song of Salvation," sung by thousands.

From that time until the present writing, the career of Philip Phillips has been one of ceaseless activity. At home and abroad, in Chautauqua assemblies, at revival services, and at Christian gatherings in many places, under various auspices, he has sung the Gospel to the hearts of vast multitudes. His "services of song" up to the year 1892 were as follows:

Great Britain and Ireland,	972 services
The Continent of Europe,	150 services
The Canadas and Australia,	187 services
India, Palestine and Egypt,	81 services
United States of America,	3,200 services

These have been supplemented by hundreds of others in the last three years. It is estimated that he has given in all nearly 4,000 services for benevolent purposes exclusively, which netted for various worthy charities over $112,000.

For nearly a year past, the health of "the Singing Pilgrim" has been visibly failing under the tremendous strain of a life of long-continued activity. It is possible that he may never again be able, as of yore, to sound forth the glorious strains of the Gospel of Jesus to a sinful world. But Philip Phillips has already accomplished a work that will make sweet music through the coming centuries. His name is known and loved wherever the voices of men and women are raised to sing the story of salvation. He who has used his talent so splendidly for the Master, may now find solace in the consciousness of a work nobly performed, and in the universal love and appreciation of godly men and women.

The portrait which appears on the first page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is from a recent photograph of Mr. Phillips. Probably most of our readers have long been familiar with his best-known pieces, from several of which we reproduce the opening musical bars, whose beautiful strains have cheered and strengthened a host of despondent hearts: "I am Sweeping through the Gates," a favorite at revivals; "The Song of Salvation," another heart-brightening composition, and that wonderful and thrilling call to repentance, "Eternity is Drawing Nigh." These are only a few of the hundreds of melodious productions with which "the Singing Pilgrim" by pen and voice has held a listening world spellbound and enchanted during the greater part of a busy life.

WITH ALL OUR MIGHT.

A MINISTER of the Gospel comes on the Sabbath day into the ante-room of the church. He is not in earnest. He has just happened to get into the ministry. He says: "I wonder what the newspapers will say to-day? I wonder how many critics there will be in church? I wonder if that sharp-looking man that sat before me last Sabbath, looking at me through those spectacles, will be there to-day? I wonder if my hair is parted straight? I wonder how my cravat is tied? I wonder if my shoes have the right polish? I wonder if that gesture made awhile ago is graceful?" The Sabbath goes by, and the people disperse to their homes; no saving impression is made, the Sabbath is dead and will not live again until the resurrection. Another man of God comes to the ante-room of the church. He says: "Now there will be hundreds of people here this morning. What shall I say to them? I may be dead before next Sabbath? The people who will be in church to-day will never all be there again. It is my last chance at them, O, God, help me now; if thou never didst help me before, help me to-day." And then he comes before the people and looks out upon the audience, and says: "All these in fifty or seventy years will be gone. They will have heard their last offer of mercy and salvation. The trumpet of judgment will sound, and they will stand before the throne, and I will be there, too. Alas, if on that day, any of them can point at me, and say: 'You didn't tell me the whole truth. You told me not of the judgment; and here I am, and the heavens are flaming, and the throne is set, and the doom is being pronounced, and I am lost, and it is your fault?'" O, how different then the preacher feels. How little he cares for what the world says of him. How his soul goes up to God in an agony of earnestness. How little he cares for the gesture or the style of his apparel or what the critics may say. It is a matter between himself and his God, and his hearers.

We were going from Camden to Philadelphia some years ago, very late at night after a meeting. It was a cold winter night, and we stood on the deck of the ferry-boat, impatient to get ashore. Before the boat came to the wharf, a man who stood on the outside of the chains slipped and dropped into the water. It is the only man that we ever saw overboard. It was a fearful night. The icicles had frozen on the wharf, and they had frozen on the steamer. The question was how to get the man up. The ropes were lowered, and we all stood with fearful anxiety, lest the man should not be able to grasp the rope; and when he grasped it and was pulled on to the deck, and we saw he was safe, although we had never seen him before, how we congratulated him. A life saved! Have we the same earnestness about getting men out of spiritual peril? Do we not go up and down in our prayer-meetings, and our Christian work, coldly saying: "Yes, there is a great deal of sin in the world, men ought to do better. I wish the people would become Christians. I think it is high time that men attended to their eternal interests," and five minutes after we put our head on the pillow we are sound asleep, or from that consideration we pass out in five minutes into the utmost mirthfulness, and have forgotten it all. Meanwhile there is a whole race overboard. How few hands are stretched out to lift men out of the flood, how few prayers offered, how few earnest importunities, how little earnest Christian work. We do not know how this suits your case, we know it suits our own. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."

GETTING OLD GRACEFULLY.

DO not be fretted because you have to come to spectacles. While glasses look premature on a young man's nose, they are an adornment to an octogenarian's face. Beside that, when your eyesight is poor, you miss seeing a great many unpleasant things that youngsters are obliged to look at. Do not be worried because your ear is becoming dull. In that way you escape being bored with many of the foolish things that are said. If the gates of sound keep out some of the music, they also keep out much of the discord. If the hair be getting thin, it takes less time to comb it, and then it is not all the time falling down over your eyes; or if it be getting white, we think that color is quite as respectable as any other; that is the color of the snow, and of the blossoms, and of the clouds, and of angelic habiliments. Do not worry because the time comes on when you must go into the next world. It is only a better room, with finer pictures, brighter society, and sweeter music. John Knox, and Harriett Newell, and Mrs. Hemans, and John Milton, and Martin Luther will be good enough company for the most of us. The corn-shock standing in the fields does not sigh dismally when the huskers leap over the fence, and throwing their arms around the stack, swing it to the ground. It is only to take the golden ear from the husk. Death to the aged Christian is only husking time, and then the load goes in from the frosts to the garner. Our congratulations to those who are nearly done with the nuisances of this world. Give your staff to your little grandson to ride horse on. You are going to be young again, and you will have no need of crutches. May the clouds around the setting sun be golden, and such as to lead the "weather-wise" to prophesy a clear morning!

GOOD USE FOR GUNS.

WE rejoiced when we read some time ago about fifty tons of gun-metal transformed into church bells. This is the best possible use for cannon. They may not in that way make as much noise, but the sound they do send forth will be more melodious and grateful. How much transformation will be necessary before we can turn our arsenals into asylums, and our fifty-four pounders can so change tone and shape as to be fit for our church towers!

There is an enormous amount of fight in human nature. Two urchins at school with fists lifted in juvenile pugilism, one of them coming off with black eye and the other with torn coat, are Von Moltke and MacMahon on a small scale. Lord Wellington, while looking at the Eton boys wrestling on the play-ground, said: "It was there that the battle of Waterloo was won." The fight is born in us, and nothing but divine grace can take it out. In literature, art, science, and theology is the same spirit of combat.

Closterman, the painter, viciously denouncing the pictures of Godfrey Kneller; the Church of England pounding John Wesley, the "Edinburgh Review" caricaturing Washington Irving, the battle of quills, the battle of crayons, the battle of chisels, the battle of base-viols, show in all ages a spirit of fight. We want a hundred Christmas days to dawn at once. We want fewer things to kill men, and more things with which to save them; and as spears are gone out of date, so that we cannot turn them into pruning-hooks, we want, by some command of the King, all the gun-metal of the earth changed into church bells, and then good strong arms to ring them for a thousand years with "Peace on earth, good will to men."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Subscriber, Harvey, Ill. Is it not wicked to use leavened bread at the Lord's Supper, leaven being a type of corruption?

There is no wickedness in it. All the accounts we have of the institution of the ordinance, indicate that Christ simply desired to establish a common ceremony of the most ordinary character. He wished his people to meet together as such and to eat and drink together in token of their equality as brethren in him, and to remember his broken body as they ate the bread and the blood he shed as they drank the wine. All the absurd ceremonial that, especially in the Roman Catholic church, has grown up around the simple ordinance, is the work of men, who in any age, would lay more stress on petty details than on the sublime significance of a doctrine or a practice.

M. E. Noble, Garfield, Wash. 1. Were the Apostles converted before the descent of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost? 2. Can a man sanctify himself or must he wait for the Holy Spirit to do it?

1. The descent of the Holy Spirit was for the special purpose of equipping the Apostles for their work. They immediately began to preach in languages they could not use before. They also, doubtless, received enlightenment at that time so as to be able to teach and preach the Word. Conversion had taken place before that time. 2. No man can sanctify himself in the sense you mean. But it depends on himself whether he is sanctified or not. God is ready to give the Holy Spirit and so glad to see men desire it, that he gives it freely to all who sincerely seek it. But if a man does not desire it and prefers to try what he can do himself with his life, the Holy Spirit is not forced on him.

J. T. Fleming, Davis, Ind. What reason have we for expecting a resurrection of the dead?

The assurance of life after death is distinctly given in the Bible. Paul devotes a whole chapter of his first epistle to the Corinthians to the subject. (See I. Cor. 15.) It does not necessarily involve a resurrection of the actual body laid in the grave; indeed, Paul describes the resurrection body as a spiritual, not a material body. His whole argument, however, goes to show that it will be conscious life in which the personal identity will be preserved. There are many other passages in which the doctrine is implied, and in Revelation in several places it is distinctly stated. Apart from the Bible, we can have no knowledge of it, but all inferences from analogy point in the same direction. The caterpillar that passes through the chrysalis state to the butterfly life is a familiar illustration. We cannot conceive of the Divine government of the world without seeing the necessity for a life beyond the grave. The inequalities of this life need to be rectified, sin punished, righteousness rewarded, and the good who have suffered wrong, vindicated. Otherwise, we could not understand the justice of God's rule.

Inquirer, Auburn, Me. What is the higher criticism?

It is not "higher" in the sense of being superior, but because it deals with more radical questions than that of words. There is a criticism as to the meaning of certain passages in the Bible, and as to the accuracy of translation. The other criticism, which is called "higher" in comparison with that, deals with the authorship and date of the books and the manner in which they were produced. Thus, the book of Isaiah shows a variation of literary style so marked, that even the unlearned reader notices the difference between the early and later chapters. The higher critics contend that the book is the work of two men, one of whom wrote at a much later date than the other. Intelligent men who do not accept all the conclusions of the higher critics, are yet thankful for the light they have shed on the Bible. We understand it better now than before they began their work.

Constant Reader, Montgomery, Vt. Do you think Herod was intoxicated when he consented to the death of John the Baptist?

He was probably excited by wine and in the hilarious condition when a man is apt to make rash promises. We know enough of the customs of the country and the time to be sure that there would be a bounteous supply of wine at such a feast, and the king would not be likely to be abstemious. The fact of his being sorry when Salome made her choice of a reward implies that he was not stupidly drun but had retained his reasoning faculti Many a man who has not full command himself through drinking is yet sufficient sensible to be aware when a trick has be played upon him. It is a fair inference that man who pledges himself to give a dancer an thing she might ask, though it were half l possessions, must have been in a besott condition.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE AFGHAN PRINCE.

FOR the first time in the history of the Royal Family of Afghanistan, a prince of the blood has crossed the ocean on a visit to Europe. The Ameer, as the sovereign of Afghanistan is called, did not risk the life of his eldest son, and in on so long a journey, but sent his second son, Nasrullah Khan, who is twenty-three years old, as the representative of his family. The English government have entertained him royally. Afghanistan lies on the North-western frontier of India, between the English and Russian possessions. The friendship of the Ameeer has consequently been eagerly sought by both nations, and England at present has the greater advantage. It was to cement the friendship that the English Government expended so much money and effort to render the visit of the Ameer's son pleasant to him. He was received by a number of distinguished officers, who escorted him to London, where the magnificent residence known as Dorchester House, had been assigned to his use. It is one of the finest private palaces in the city, the cost of the building alone having been a milion dollars. There the prince and his large suite were lodged, and a guard of the finest soldiery in the British army was appointed to attend him. He was taken to visit the Queen, and was feasted and entertained in various ways. Reviews of troops, visits to dockyards and fortresses, inspection of manufactories and other spectacles, in which a barbaric prince might be expected to take an interest, were arranged for his delectation. The visit, whether agreeable to the young Afghan or not, has not been an altogether unalloyed pleasure to the English Court. The prince offered his hosts by many discourtesies, and on several occasions displayed gross rudeness. He and his suite were dirty in their habits, and their conduct was highly offensive, but all this was overlooked in consideration of the prince's character as the representative of Afghan royalty and in the hope that the Ameer would be pleased with the cordiality with which his son was treated. Personally, the son had no claim on exceptional hospitality, but there was a natural presumption that kindness shown to him would be a sure way to retaining his father's good will. The same principle in the treatment of Christians, who are children of the King of kings, involves no presumption. The direct and explicit promise is given that kindness shown to them, because they are Christians, is well-pleasing to God.

Whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in my name, because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward. Mark 9:41.

The Right to Naturalize.

The change effected by the Legislature of New York, in the laws of naturalization is likely to embarrass some of the politicians. Heretofore several Courts have had the power to grant naturalization papers, and the Court of Common Pleas alone has often issued ten thousand such papers in a year. Under the new law the Supreme Court of the State is the only Court besides the United States Courts which has the power to grant naturalization. The same statute also prohibits under heavy penalty the payment of fees for any person applying for naturalization by any political society or organization, or by any person who has been nominated for office. Aliens in New York desiring to become citizens will consequently be obliged in future to pay all expenses connected with the application out of their own pockets, and to obtain their citizenship from the duly authorized Court. The alien who desires citizenship and is properly qualified, will have no difficulty in obtaining papers; the only change is that he must apply for himself and prove that he is eligible, instead of gaining citizenship by the good offices of other parties. Citizenship in Christ's kingdom may be obtained in the same way. The sinner desiring to belong to him, needs no advocate or sponsor, but may go to him in perfect confidence, relying on his promise:

Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. John 6:37.

A Ride on an Avalanche.

A press dispatch from Victoria, B. C., reports a thrilling adventure of one of the citizens of that place. He had occasion to go to Alberni on business that detained him for a week or two, and took up his quarters in the vicinity of a gold quartz mine, in which he was interested. He was returning to the house one afternoon from an inspection of the mine, when it occurred to him that it would be easier traveling to cross the mountain on the hard snow than by the trail. The distance was shorter and the path smoother. He made the first part of the journey safely, but as he approached a precipitous part of the road he saw that a huge boulder, which projected from the side of the mountain below his path, was trembling. It became detached and went rolling down into the canon with frightful velocity. The snow on which he was walking must have rested on the boulder, for no sooner had it fallen than a large area began slipping downward under his feet. He flung himself down on his face, digging his hands and feet into the snow as hard as he could. The rate of descent was slow at first, but increased every moment. Its weight and momentum were enormous, for a giant tree that stood in the way was broken and swept down by the avalanche. It seemed an age to him, but was probably only a few minutes, before the avalanche reached the foot of the mountain. There was a shock, and he was hurled into the Alberni River. He was not much hurt, and he was able to climb up the bank, but his nerves were shattered by his awful experience. He realized as many others have done in their moral and spiritual life, that although the smooth path may be more pleasant for walking than the rough, it may involve appalling danger.

There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death. Prov. 14:12.

Fourteen Years of Peril.

An extraordinary discovery was made at Bellevue Hospital, New York, last week at the autopsy on a man who had died in the hospital. He had fallen from a truck and had apparently died from concussion of the brain. In making the autopsy the surgeon noticed the mark of an old bullet wound on his left temple. An incision at that point revealed a long channel leading backward to the brain. Following the channel, the surgeon was astonished to find at its upper end an elongated lead bullet fitting a 32-calibre revolver. It was enclosed in a membraneous sac, and had evidently been there for years. It lay on the left hemisphere of the brain about half an inch from the skull bone. Inquiries of the man's family elicited the fact that the wound was inflicted in 1881, during a disturbance at Evansville, Ind., where he was then living. The bullet must have been lying on the brain for fourteen years. The doctors are astonished that the man could have lived. He must have been in constant danger of death. The slightest shock, even a stumble, was liable to have caused his death. To have rendered the man safe from such an accident, the bullet should have been removed by the doctors who treated him after the shooting; but as the wound healed and the man lived, they may have thought it an unnecessary risk to attempt to remove it. Sometimes a similar mistake is made in dealing with moral injuries. When the drunkard signs the pledge and keeps it, his friends are apt to be content. But no man is safe until through the Holy Spirit, the evil desire is removed from his nature. While it is there the wonder is not that the man falls, but that his fall is delayed so long. God has the same reason for complaint against the reformers of our day that he had against those of the past, of whom he said:

They have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying, Peace, peace when there is no peace. Jer. 8:11.

AFGHAN ROYALTY ABROAD—DORCHESTER HOUSE—PRINCE NASRULLAH KHAN.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Presbyterian Church of New Zealand at its General Assembly in Auckland, reported eighty-four ministers, fifteen students, 10,436 communicants, 200 Sabbath Schools, and 14,437 scholars. The income for practical purposes was $187,575, and for foreign missions $3,450.

The Delegates to the World's Convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union have received a warm welcome in London. On June 16, Miss Willard, Mrs. Stewart, Mrs Clara C. Hoffman, and Miss Belle Kearney spoke at a great meeting held in the City Temple, of whice Dr. Joseph Parker is pastor. Other meetings were held in the City Road Chapel (Wesleyan), and in the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

The National Christian Citizenship League asks us to remind ministers of its earnest wish for sermons on the duties of Christian Citizens to be preached on Sunday, June 30.

During the past twelve months six thousand and sixty persons were treated at the dispensary of the Judson Memorial Church, New York, of which Dr. Edward Judson is pastor. The fresh-air work of this church is being planned and vigorously pushed for the coming season. The church is situated in a densely populated section of the city in which there is great poverty.

Major Cole's Services at Fort Scott Kans. are reaching a large circle of non-churchgoers. A correspondent in the neighborhood reports that all the churches are uniting heartily in the work and that there is a prospect of a large ingathering of souls. The work is unprecedented there.

At the Bible Conference at Old Point Comfort, Dr. A. C. Dixon, of Brooklyn; Dr. Erdman of Germantown; Rev. John McCarthy, of the China Inland Mission; and Rev. John W. Dean, the Quaker Evangelist, and other well-known ministers and evangelists have been present and given addresses.

During the Month of June the Bible Institute of Chicago, has had many visits from pastors and evangelists passing through the city. It was announced that Dr. A. T. Pierson would lecture every morning, and that friends would be welcome to hear him and see the work of the Institute.

Dr. J. W. Chapman's Services at Rochester, N. Y., led to a revival which was continued after his departure. Many persons who were aroused by the preaching of the Evangelist, have been led to make profession of faith. The number of accessions to the membership of the Brick Church have brought the number of names on the roll to about two thousand.

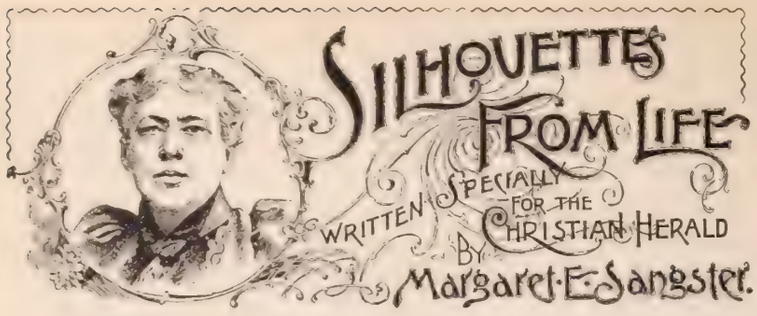
Rev. James A. Worden, D.D., Superintendent of the Sabbath School and Missionary Department of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, has been presented with a purse of $1,000 in gold by the members of the interdenominational class of Sabbath School teachers and others, meeting on Saturday afternoons in Association Hall, Philadelphia.

A Conference of Clergymen and Laymen was held last week at 113 Fulton street, to consider devotional and evangelistic work downtown. Representative men and women of all denominations declared their interest in the movement and their desire to co-operate in the efforts to be made in downtown work.

Dr. John Hall, Pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, showed his interest in the Mission to Jews conducted by Rev. Hermann Warszawiak, by attending the Saturday afternoon service on June 15, in the Church of Sea and Land, and making an earnest address to the Jewish audience. Afterwards he took his seat in the body of the church and listened to Mr. Warszawiak's discourse and the usual debate which follows it.

The First Congregational Church of Montclair, N. J., has been celebrating the silver jubilee both of the founding of the church and the pastorate of Dr. Amory H. Bradford. On June 2 the morning exercises included an address on "Fifty Years in the Ministry," by the pastor's father, the Rev. Benjamin F. Bradford, and an anniversary sermon by Dr. Bradford chiefly historical in its character. In the evening there was a meeting with addresses by A. J. F. Behrends, D.D., and Lyman Abbott, D.D. of Brooklyn.

The Fortieth Convention of the Sunday School Association of New York State was held at Saratoga, June 11-13. Mr. P. B. Bromfield of The Christian Herald was elected President. Dr. W. A. Duncan in the course of his report said that an addition of 250,000 had been made to the enrolment of the Sunday Schools of the State. The record now stands: 8,116 Sunday Schools: 24,347 officers and teachers: 866,556 children and 230,841 adults. Among the prominent speakers at the Convention were: Dr. I. J. Lansing of Boston, Rev. E. P. Armstrong, Dr. J. O. Wilson of Brooklyn, Rev. E. P. St. John, Mr. E. H. Hawley, Judge L. L. Hitchcock, Miss Grace A. Griswold and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts. At the concluding session, Mr. D. L. Moody delivered an inspiring address to an audience of fully three thousand persons in Convention Hall. The musical exercises of the Convention were under the charge of Mr. and Mrs. George C. Stebbins.



DOROTHY'S VACATION.

"I FEEL as if I had lost my opportunity in life," wrote Dorothy Dane to her college chum, Marcia Potter, during the first week of vacation. Everybody does not fully appreciate the sense of letting-down which comes to a student, when, a year of intellectual work and hard routine over, she simply sinks into a position of one of a quiet-going family. Dorothy loved books, loved hard and eager study, and was noted for the intensity of her application. In her classes she stood very high, and at the commencement exercises she carried off numerous prizes, and received honorable mention where somebody else was first. The professors were very proud of Miss Dane. She would go out as a credit to the college, and they were the more interested that she expected to become a teacher, and to carry their methods and ways of getting at things into other schools and places.

Commencement had been over with its joys and excitements for several weeks. Dorothy had become used to waking when she pleased in the morning, to regulating her day, not by bells, but to suit herself. She had valiantly laid out a course of reading when she first came home, but so many interruptions broke in upon her plans, that she had not been able to adhere to her prescribed system, and as she finished and sealed her little note to Marcia, she sighed wearily. Dorothy was experiencing the subtle but sharp pain which befalls those who disappoint themselves. She was not fulfilling her own ideal, and she was conscious of an acute pang because of it.

"Dolly!" Her father was calling her from the foot of the stairs. He used the pet name of her childhood.

"Yes, father."

"Your mother needs you, my girl. Eliza has taken herself off in a tiff, and Aunt Jane's folks are coming to dinner, and the mother has a sick-headache. You'll have to step into the kitchen and fly around."

To some girls this necessity would have presented no alarms, but Dorothy's Latin and rhetoric and algebra had neither given her training in housewifery, nor developed in her the least inclination to what she called domestic drudgery. If the truth must be told, it was to her thoughtlessness that Eliza's departure in the middle of a summer morning, without adequate warning or sufficient occasion, was due.

Dorothy's return to her home had made the weekly "wash" much larger than usual, and the ironing of pretty puffed waists, ruffled and tucked skirts, and elaborate "lingerie" of every description made a marked inroad on the time and strength, and also on the temper, of Eliza, the single maid, called by courtesy, the help. It was a community in which help was not readily obtained. Quick-tempered and capable, Eliza was a person to be prized and considered. Dorothy did neither.

While Dorothy, in a cool, white muslin dressing-sacque beside a vine-shaded window, in an easy chair, was writing to her school friend, Eliza was angrily contemplating the third tucked skirt she had ironed that day. She remonstrated volubly.

"If Miss Dane wants to wear white petticoats, she's got to iron them; that's all I've got to say," and she set her flat-iron down with a thump.

Mrs. Dane, a fragile woman with a weary face, was shelling peas in a large tin pan. It was not like her to give a hasty answer, but she had company coming, and the dread of her life, a sick-headache, was announcing its advent in creeping chills down her spine, dull, throbbing aches back of her eyes, a screwing, boring sensation in her temples, and a wave of nausea at the pit of her stomach. Of all intolerable miseries, sick-headache is the worst, the most relentless, a nightmare of wretchedness to her who suffers from its attacks. Mrs. Dane always felt cross when a headache came. For the life of her, she could not repress irritation when people fretted at her in these circumstances.

"Eliza," she said, "where's the difference? If you are doing that, you haven't anything else to do. I'm sure you have had it easy for a long time, and I can't understand you; you've done nothing but find fault ever since my daughter came from college."

"Well," said the outspoken Eliza, "why doesn't she take hold and help?"

"She's tired, and needs rest, Eliza," said the mother.

"So do I," said Eliza, "and what's more, I mean to have it. I'm going straight off to my sister's, and I'll not come back till I'm sent for, and them I'm not goin' to iron three white skirts with seven tucks apiece in 'em in any one week."

Before there was time to realize the state of affairs, Eliza majestically stalked off, and Mrs. Dane, by this time in a fainting condition from pain and worry, dragged herself to her bedroom and laid her throbbing head on her pillow. On her way to that refuge, she called her husband, busy in his study over next Sunday's sermon, and he in turned called Dorothy.

If you fancy that our college girl was about to be daunted by the difficulties before her, you do not know either the end-of-the-century young woman, or the real good gained by diligent study, and discipline of trained faculties. A girl may not learn how to make a pie by understanding an equation, or acquiring the ability to conjugate the verb "to be" in four languages, but without doubt the facile mind, educated in one direction, turns easily to another field of action. Dorothy had found her opportunity. Before going downstairs, a verse, her text for the day, flashed into her memory; it was, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

The kitchen was stifling, with the great range filled to the lids with glowing coal, Eliza's ironing-day fire. Potatoes, scraped and ready for boiling, were standing in water waiting to be put on the fire; the peas were shelled. The house was full of freshly-laundried clothing, and the big basket stood there, with its many damp rolls untouched. Her own skirt, half finished, hung on the board.

Mr. Dane came into the kitchen, his spectacles on, his pale, scholarly face much disturbed.

"Your mother's head is worse than ever. She is crying," he said, helplessly.

"I'll go to mother," Dorothy answered cheerily, more cheerily than she felt, "and you, father, dear, go back to your sermon. I can get dinner, and everything will right itself before long. I've been frightfully thoughtless. I'm ashamed of myself, but don't be worried. The girl who doesn't know how to cook, must learn, that's all. I shall be ashamed of myself if I am not able to do as well as Eliza."

Dorothy's courage and pluck were quite reassuring. She said to herself, "This is my first real chance for right-down Christian endeavor, and I'm not going to be a coward."

Mother was far too ill to give advice, so Dorothy looked on the top shelf of the closet and found a little cooking book — just such a book as is an invaluable gift to the women of her period. A little searching, and she found her inexperienced hand taken in that of a guide both motherly and efficient. All that she needed to know was between the covers of that book.

When at one o'clock, an old fashioned carry-all brought Uncle Rufus, Aunt Jane, Tommy, Theo, and Alice, Dorothy's nice dinner, consisting of broiled steak, new potatoes, green peas, sliced tomatoes, bread and butter, strawberries, and delicious coffee was ready and waiting.

The vacation gave Dorothy a splendid opportunity to acquire a practical acquaintance with housekeeping, and also learn how to spare others, learning which is seldom obtained by those who never work with their own hands.

And Eliza? Some people would say that she would be properly served by being taken at her word, and allowed to stay away. But they would not be people who live where it is nearly impossible to secure domestic help at any price. Dorothy waited two days; then she borrowed a horse and phaeton from a neighbor and drove three miles to Eliza's sister's, and found Eliza quite ready to come home again. There were no promises or pledges on either side, but things worked smoothly the rest of the summer, for Dorothy estimated better the amount to be done, and took her turn in lending a hand. Her bearing part of the burden, made the vacation a pleasant one to her tired mother, whose headaches came less frequently, now that a strong young shoulder was willingly put to the wheel.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

In a Home of Delights.

How the Merry June Days Pass in Our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn — Many New Arrivals.

THE bluest of skies, green trees and spacious lawns, dotted with daisies, buttercups and red and white clover-heads, greet the bands of children who are coming almost daily to Mont-Lawn as guests of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a ten-days' outing. Long before the wagonette with its load of boys and girls can reasonably be expected to be seen among the trees, as the road winds up from the village of Nyack, —"the American Naples"—the children already at the Home are gathered on the lawn to catch the first glimpse of the newcomers. At the foot of the hill, some of the boys prefer to dismount and to actually feel the ground of their new home of delights. As the merry party nears the chapel, which stands ready to welcome them to the well-appointed supper in the dining-room—which is an extension of the chapel—they are greeted with glad cries of joy, loud huzzas, and the waving of handkerchiefs and caps.

After supper, at the sound of the gong, all assemble in front of the main building of the Home for a march to the chapel-room proper. When in line, to the chorus of "Glory, glory, hallelujah," the children, two by two, move down the gentle slope. The very atmosphere aids the singing of the old martial chorus, and the eyes, so long used to the slums, brighten as they slowly, but joyously, wander from the green lawn to the stately mountains beyond. For these by their very presence tell the poor city child, of nature and the marvellous works of the Creator as no word from the teacher, or the printed lines of the geography could ever do. Some little ones, whose eyes held a hunted expression, peculiar to hardly-used children, walked slowly, as step by step they fairly gasped in long breaths the new, fresh, cool air of Mont-Lawn.

In the Chapel, rising simultaneously at the sound of the chord from the organ the young voices sing, now one happy hymn, now another. And such singing! The walls echo with the music. A short lesson is read by both children and teachers, followed by more singing, after which, with heads bowed reverently, all unite in the Lord's Prayer. Then regularly and orderly do the children march to their respective dormitories to prepare for a good night's rest, on comfortable beds, in large, airy, neat and clean rooms. And thus ends the child's first evening at Mont-Lawn.

The Home is, like the famed Jerusalem of old, "beautiful for situation." Half way up the side of the rugged Hook Mountain, whose fierce outline softens into verdant beauty upon close acquaintance, the grounds afford scope for all the various possibilities of active young Americans. Large fields gleaming with the white and gold of daisies and buttercups, tempt boys and girls alike to gather bouquets, with which the various parts of the Home are kept bright and fresh.

Below the Home, hidden entirely by the heavy foliage of the elm, maple, spruce, white-wood, and pine, lies Nyack. Beyond the trees, where it reflects the rays of the morning sun, flows the Hudson, around which so many legends of old-time Indian bravery cluster. On the other side lies Tarrytown, whose houses seem to be ever ambitious to reach the top of the hill. Northward are seen the stately homes of Mr. John Rockefeller and his son, Mr. William Rockefeller.

Further still to the north one can catch picturesque glimpses of Sing Sing. When the soft, half-light of early morning, or twilight, can be seen the far-off tops of the sand-hills of the Nutmeg State. And as the eyes of the children, grown tired with the ceaseless array of rigid brick houses, are rested and refreshed by wondrous views of the famed scenery of the Hudson. Indeed, it is no unusual thing to hear one small lad cry to another, "There! See how lovely the water looks!" only to be met with the reply, "Yes; and the trees."

Seventy acres are at the disposal of the Home, and the children enjoy a freedom never dreamed of in New York. On the lawn are swings, croquet, and numerous exciting games of base ball. Then, inspired, does boyish enthusiasm wax high, and every nerve is strained to have "our side" beat.

Some of the questions are pitiful, for they reveal the poverty of the child-life shut out from all enjoyment or understanding of the country. Said one little lad, whose pale face and large, serious eyes betoken a thoughtful, dwarfed life, as he walked slowly to a teacher, with hand carefully upraised, "Please, ma'am, may I pick one daisy—just one? I should like to."

The facile pen of the artist may catch and hold a passing expression, as he delineates the features on paper, but it is left to the power of words to adequately convey an idea of the incredulity, surprise and slowly-realized joy which passed over the face of the lad as he heard the answer. "Yes, little man, all you wish!" To make a face so glad, and to hear a slow, contented sigh, is worth much self-denial For these are the Master's little ones, of whom he said "Inasmuch."

It was Frœbel who made a life study of the child, but it was an old Latin poet who first told the world that "a child was man in embryo." All possible tendencies the wonderful gift of life and inherited disposition are shown to the careful watcher of child-student at Mont-Lawn. Many little acts of courtesy, more gracious than those exemplified in any of the charming juvenile books, pass almost unnoticed. Indications in these untrained boys that the pessimist—who has declared that the age of chivalry has passed—was mistaken, make glad the heart of the teacher.

Many brothers and sisters come and go, bringing pale cheeks and sad eyes, leaving with rounded, sun-browned faces and child-like eyes, but not all are so dependent upon each other for happiness as were two an elder brother, aged eleven, and his five-year-old baby sister. Early and late hand in hand, plucking daisies or sitting contentedly and silent in the shade of some tree, they passed their visit. Once in awhile a game of ball did prove irresistible, but the little sister was ever an interested watcher, while the lad, with a thoughtfulness beyond his years, would come and sit by her when his side was "out". If he could be spared. Helpful hands were extended to the younger and weaker ones, and consideration was the usual order of the day.

But these children who have lived all their life in the shadow have many points—in common with all the rest of the human family. As from the earliest times blows has been considered a prompt way of settling a dispute, so now are the pugilistic tendencies of these young Americans very easily aroused, and many are the differences which would be settled in this way were it not for the watchful eyes of the teacher who acts as an ever-ready and quick-peace-maker.

The possibilities for good at Mont-Lawn are unlimited, and though ten days is a very short time during which to build a life for a helpful, noble, patriotic future, the effort is made to instill into the plastic receptive child-nature the fundamental lessons of character-building.

Day by day the work increases, and with the daily change of children comes added responsibilities and augmented effort to make this visit to Mont-Lawn a basis of particular brightness for the little ones.

THE AGE OF THE WORLD.

ABOUT two centuries ago, Archbishop Usher published his Sacred Chronology, and his venerable name gave a currency to his system which has continued till the present generation. In the human mind there is an impatient craving for definite information, and where this is wanting one often finds a strong tendency to help it out by taking for granted what may really not be implied. So very definite was the well-meant result of Usher's work that our fathers were required to believe, and I believe, that the world was created precisely in the year 4004 before the birth of Christ. The foundation on which this scheme rested was the assumption that the Old Testament, from beginning to end, furnished a continuous chronological sequence of events, whereas it is now understood rather to give prominence to individual periods for at least two thousand years of the history of man upon the earth. The calculation of time from Adam to Abraham depends upon two genealogical tables, one before and another after the Flood. Usher assumed that these records noted every successive birth after the manner of a family register. A more profound study of the documents has shown not only that such was not the case, but also that the writer had a different object in view. His purpose was not to exhibit, in these early times, a complete genealogical record of particular families; but generally to indicate lineage or descent. At the very beginning a deliverer was promised, and it was necessary to show that he was descended from the first woman through the lines of Abraham and David.

This principle having been unhappily overlooked, an unwise attempt was made to commit the Old Testament to a system of chronology which, being much too short, brought Scripture and science into conflict, particularly at the birth of geology which, when rightly understood, yields strong confirmation to the testimony of revelation. From what has been already stated, it must be apparent how terribly precarious is any judgment on the age of the earth which is based on the genealogical tables, for no superstructure can be more stable than its foundation. But it is not necessary to stop here, for dogmatism on this subject is completely overturned by the fact—now equally well ascertained—that Moses neither assigned any date to the age of the earth, nor has given any indication by which it can be fixed. Moses did not by any means affirm that the world was made 4004 years before the birth of Christ; but simply "in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." Between the first and the second verses of the first chapter of Genesis hundreds of thousands of years may have interposed.

The prominence which was given to this fact by Dr. Chalmers has been found sufficient to meet all the legitimate demands of geology as bearing upon the age of the earth. What that precise age is, it may never be within the power of science to make even an approximation; but, however large the demand may be when the last word shall come to be spoken, the believer in revelation can have no cause of disquietude so long as he keeps this truth in view, that the Bible has nowhere fixed the date of creation or committed itself to any deliverance touching the age of the earth.

And yet some divines, with an unhappy industry, have fabricated a belabored system of chronology and committed every age of the Old Testament to their theory by noting in the margin how long each event happened after the creation of the world.

"LIKE A BIRD."

SAVIOUR, like a bird to thee,
Weary and wounded my soul would flee;
Oh let me fold my wings and rest
Peacefully, trustingly, on thy breast.

Refrain:
Like a bird let me fly to thee,
In thine arms kindly shelter me;
Then my soul no more shall roam
Far, far away from home.

Saviour, thou my grief hast borne,
Thou hast a balm for hearts that mourn;
One gentle word, and I shall rest
Hopefully, lovingly, on thy breast.

I was lost—till found by thee;
Thine, blessed Saviour, the glory be;
Gladly I fold my wings and rest
Lovingly, tenderly, on thy breast.

THE WEB OF LIFE.

MY life, which was so straight and plain,
Has now become a tangled skein,
Yet God still holds the thread;
Weave as I may, his hand doth guide
The shuttle's course, however wide
The chain in woof be wed.

And now I never lose my trust.
Weave as I may—and weave I must—
For God doth hold the thread;
He guides my shuttle on its way.
He makes complete my task each day;
What more, then, can be said?

APOCALYPTIC FIGURES.

The Imagery of the Book of Revelation Typical of Events in Earth and Sky at the Close of the Dispensation.

BY WILLIAM MAUDE.

THE sublime background upon which the seer gazed was not simply a lifeless and painted picture; on the contrary, it was instinct with a Divine life and motion. The cherubim were in ceaseless motion day and night, crying, "Holy, holy, holy," and ever and anon the elders rose from their royal seats, saying, "Worthy art Thou, our Lord and our God, to receive the glory and the honor and the power, for thou didst create all things, and because of Thy will they are, and were created."

Now what I desire by these remarks specially to impress on the reader's mind, is the fact that this entire scene, or background, as I have called it, continued within the sphere of the seer's vision throughout the whole course of the Apocalyptic judgments as contained in the seals, the trumpets, and the vials; in other words, that the whole of the action described from the beginning of the fifth chapter to the middle of the nineteenth, took place in the presence of the throne, the elders, and the cherubim. That this was the case can clearly be proved from the passing references to one or other of them which occur throughout these visions.

Thus, when the Lamb takes the seven-sealed book of the inheritance, he does so standing "in the midst of the throne, and of the four living creatures, and in the midst of the elders." Again, as the Lamb, having received the book, breaks its first four seals, the voices of the four cherubim are heard successively saying, as with a loud voice, "come." Again, in connection with the description given in the seventh chapter of the "great multitude which no man could number," we are not only told that they were "standing before the throne and before the Lamb," but reference is made to the simultaneous worship of "the elders and the four living creatures;" while one of the elders actually enters into conversation with John respecting their identity and their destiny. In like manner, of the hundred and forty-four thousand seen standing on the Mount Zion, in the fourteenth chapter, it is said: "And they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four living creatures and the elders." Again, when, in the following chapter, the seven angels who have the seven last plagues come out from the temple in heaven, it is "one of the four living creatures" who delivers to them the seven golden vials full of the wrath of God. And, lastly, in the nineteenth chapter, after the awful destruction of Babylon, it is said: "And her smoke goeth up forever and ever. And the four and twenty elders and the four living creatures fell down and worshipped God that sitteth on the throne, saying, Amen; Hallelujah."

I lay stress on these facts because they help to an understanding of the book. If we can get an idea of the general plan, or plot, as we should say if we were speaking of a novel or play, each part falls into its proper place and the book ceases to be the incomprehensible work it too often is.

THE LORD'S COMING.

A popular little work by Mrs. Baxter, whose articles on the Sunday School Lessons appear every week in this journal. It contains fifteen chapters on the events predicted in the Bible to occur between the present time and the close of the Millennium. Third Edition—Revised and Enlarged. 104 pages. Price fifteen cents. Published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 91-101 Bible House, New York.

THE COMMANDMENTS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing July 7. Mark 12: 28-33.

WHAT has the Christians to do with law? He is not under the law, but under grace. There can be no question as to that fact in the mind of any one who accepts the Apostle Paul as an authorized exponent of Christianity. Yet the ten commandments have their place in the life of the Christian, and that an important one. The son in the household should surely lead as clean a life as is required of the servant. He has more privileges than the servant, but that fact carries higher obligations. If the head of the household will not tolerate in a servant certain behavior which is abhorrent to him, how much less will he countenance it in his son! One who is near to him, who has his Spirit and claims most intimate relations with him, is bound by the most sacred obligations to observe the rules of the household. Therefore the Decalogue has a place in the Christian's life, for it tells him what is odious in the eyes of his Heavenly Father. It is the standard which a man must attain, before he can become even a servant, which the son should have passed. The more closely these several commands are studied, the more clearly is it seen that they are not arbitrary edicts, but are based on a profound knowledge of human nature and its highest needs. Every one is justified by the inner conscience and its reasonableness admitted. There is not one in the ten which makes a demand on human nature that is not clearly a duty, even if the command had never been issued. When a man admits the existence of God the whole Decalogue becomes a natural and reasonable code of laws. His duty to God and his duty to his fellow-men require just such conduct as the Decalogue enjoins. The Christian should do more, not less than is there set down. And the extension of his duty is in the line of the commands. So far from wronging his neighbor in any of the ways indicated, he will do him good. He will not kill him, but endeavor to save his life. He will not steal from him, but give him what he needs. Negative goodness becomes active philanthropy in the new dispensation. The spirit of love, which Christ inculcated, recognizes in the the ten commands indications of God's character and of the paths in which he would have his people walk. They mark the byways which lead to precipices and quicksands, and he does not stand looking at them with regret that he must not enter, but presses upward and onward in the safe way. They serve also as tests of self-examination, revealing all that is hidden in the heart that leads to evil. Christ's explanation of the seventh commandment furnishes the clue to the use of all, and carries each prohibition deep into the dark recesses of the heart from which the overt act in the conduct springs.

DR. F. E. CLARK'S REPORT.

From the report just submitted to the United Society of Christian Endeavor by its President, Dr. F. E. Clark, we take the following encouraging extract:

Our fellowship has increased all the world around as never before in all the fourteen years of our history. In many new countries—notably in Germany, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, and Holland—the work has been started, and the Constitution has been translated into a number of additional languages in many lands.

Our British and Australian brethren have shared with us in this general prosperity, and conventions of great power have been reported, not only from England, Scotland, and Wales, but from Japan and China, while France, Jamaica, South Africa, and other countries have shared in similar convention blessings. The Junior Societies have increased.

THE EPWORTH LEAGUE CONFERENCE.

By the time this journal reaches the hands of its readers, the gathering hosts of Epworth Leaguers will be approaching Chattanooga from all points of the compass. On June 27, at 2:30 P. M., the great Conference is to be called to order. Such a scene as that will be, it is not easy to imagine. Since the Cleveland Conference in 1893, the League has advanced with giant strides. Not only have new chapters been organized in vast numbers, but the membership of the chapters existing two years ago has enormously increased. Besides this, the Southern section has sprung into vigorous life, with a complete organization, and in missionary lands the League has taken root and is bearing fruit. Everywhere the League has earnest and enthusiastic friends and none can predict whereunto it will grow. All we know is that the young people of the Methodist Churches in almost every city, town, and village on the Continent are banded together to work for Christ and for the relief of humanity, and are in their several communies laboring for the advancement of Christ's Kingdom. After two years of such work, their representatives now come together to recount the trials and triumphs of the work and to cheer each other and stimulate each other by renewing their pledges and planning new campaigns. It will be an inspiring scene and the spiritual electricity that will be generated in the Southern city will be felt to the farthest limits of our land, in Canada and beyond the seas.

The programme that has been issued is a triumph of organizing talent. It provides for every minute of the sessions of the four days of the Conference. The most minute details of the meetings have been arranged and each member who is to participate knows exactly the place and minute when his or her services will be in requisition. There could be no better guarantee that the Conference will accomplish the purpose for which it is convened and that its time will not be frittered away in discursive speeches or debates aside from the main subject. It would be impossible here to give even the barest outline of the proceedings as they have been mapped out, but a sufficient indication of their general character may be gained from the four subjects to which each day has been respectively assigned. These are: The Methodism of the Future; Methodism: Its life and modes of Expression; Methodism: Its Doctrine and Spirit; and The waiting for the Descent of the Holy Spirit. As we read the list of famous speakers who have promised to deal with various topics under these general heads we realize how magnificently the managers of the Conference have provided for the benefit of the delegates. While we cannot but regret that it was deemed necessary for this stalwart organization to quit the Christian Endeavor fold and set up for itself in the great business of spiritual advancement, we realize as we read this programme that the separation was like that which comes in the old homestead, when the sons go out with the old people's blessing, to found new families and perpetuate the family traditions.

In connection with the great Conference we give on this page portraits of five of the most prominent officers of League. Bishop J. N. Fitzgerald is President of the League of the North Church. He is a native of New Jersey is now in his fifty-eighth year. He intended for the profession of the law studied under Mr. Frederick T. Young Princes in the East.

The outhful Maharajah of Mysore, and H ontrol of the Destinies of a Great Pr ince—An Interesting Ceremony.

EUROPEAN and native guests assembled at the royal palace of Mysore, India, lately, to witness a strange and interesting ceremony. It was the installation of the young Maharajah, as ruler of he eat Indian province of Mysore, in uccsion to his father, lately dead. From n tist's sketch in the London "G hic," we are enabled to reproduce the scene on this brilliant occaion The British Resident conducted he y ruler to the steps of the throne, nd ien read to him a long ette rom the Viceroy, announcng le regency of the Queen-Mott until the Maharajah atain his majority, when he will le invested with the full ows of his position if his conuct and character prove satisacto meanwhile. He was nge to walk in the steps of his ath who had ruled wisely. He ienscended the throne, and ne the palace officials recited ts ng list of titles and pediree after which he was preent with a very handsome eclce of precious stones, on eha of the Viceroy of India. lis ative officers and gentlemen ne ame forward and tendered he allegiance, offering their wos and gifts, their weapons einin all cases returned by the ou ul Maharajah.

In monarchial countries genral it occasionally happens that the uccsor to the throne is a mere hil European history, like that of as n countries, is full of the records f uthful kings and queens, and hei influence upon the welfare of their eop. Ordinarily, there is a regent durng e minority of the monarch, either the mot r or some near relative on the paternal le acting in that capacity, and relievng e young ruler of the weightier cares f aninistration. Meanwhile the latter is naving, by observation and experience, or e duties of the future. He studies the nee of the people, the laws governing the tat and the records of previous reigns. His ife almost wholly educational, and happy ithat people whose prince, having first he ar of the Lord before his eyes, seeks as h highest ambition their general good, and hose love of justice will prevent the opression of the poor and the favoring of he ch. Such belong to the category of tho good kings of whom the Biblical reco says: "They did that which was ight ous in the sight of the Lord."

The little ruler of Mysore has at his beck and all nearly 4,200,000 people in his own erritory, of whom probably less than 40,000 are Christians. His country is a fertile table land in southern India, but in some par there are high mountains and deep ravin. Like some of our own Western Stas, it is liable to seasons of great aridity, and the result is that famine has been ren edly felt among the people of Mysore. Thousands upon thousands of homes have bee pinched for bread in 1875-76-77, and in 80-81. In one of those years 200,000 cat perished for want of food, and in 187 over a quarter of a million persons in Mysore were without means of subsistence, and had to be fed at the public expense. Even at the present time, the province is far from prosperous, and the young Maharajah's court will be conducted with a modesty and economy suited to the condition of the country. He is said to be a youth of talent and promise, kind-hearted and discreet, and not inimical to Christian missionaries.

Bangalore, the capital, is the centre of missionary activity in the principality. The first mission school was established there in 1817, but for a long time the Hindus were unfriendly to the preaching of the Gospel in Kanarese—the vernacular of the people. There are now many Christian missions in the province, and the mothers and fathers of Mysore, whose ancestors worshipped a multitude of strange gods, hear their little ones lisping the name of Jesus and singing the praises of the Redeemer.

Small Courtesies.

They are far more important than many young people think. Are you particular to write notes of thanks soon after receiving gifts or acts of courtesy? The value of such a note is greatly increased by its being prompt. If some friend leaves a bunch of violets at your door, and you fail to acknowledge it until the flowers have faded, your thanks, when they do come, are tardy. When flowers or fruit are sent to those who are ill, they, of course, cannot repay the courtesy by a little note themselves, but someone in the family should do it for them. Your note of thanks should be very genial, showing that you are really pleased by the kind attention, and the happier because of it. Do not be afraid to write warmly and cordially on such occasions. If stiff and formal you are unjust both to your friend and yourself. More than half the graciousness of thanks arises from their prompt and spontaneous tender by the person benefited.

Mother's Lullabies.

Of all the safeguards that a mother's love can place around a son or danghter, writes Elizabeth Harrison, I know of none which is stronger than the love of good music. Music of any kind appeals to the innate sense of harmony which lies in each human being. The boy or the girl who has learned to sing well, to enjoy playing on some musical instrument, has a never ending resource of entertainment and amusement that does not injure the body nor corrupt the soul.

A love of music, like a love of everything else which we wish to have deep-rooted in the very nature of a child, ought to begin in earliest infancy; and in this training there is nothing which can take the place of the mother's sweet lullaby. Thus love for mother and love for music are interwoven, each making the other stronger. I know one beautiful mother who makes it a daily habit to sing for half an hour to her three little ones after they are undressed and in bed. She began this when her oldest one was six months old, so that, with rare exceptions, their young eyes have closed upon the world each night with the sound of sweet melody ringing in their ears. I knew another sweet-souled mother who, being an invalid, sang but feebly herself, but who, notwithstanding many obstacles, persevered in having her little daughter taught to sing by one of the best vocalists in the city. I chanced to make a call one day while the singing lesson was going on. "What a sweet voice your daughter has!" said I. "Ah, yes," the mother replied, as she lay wearily back upon her pillows, "I often lie here and listen to her singing and think what sweet lullabies she will be able, some day, to sing to her babies." The child has just passed her tenth birthday, but the far-sighted mother-heart was already preparing her to be strong where she herself had been weak.

LAO BABIES.

WHEN a little brown baby first opens its black eyes to the light in the Lao country in North Siam, it doesn't find awaiting its advent a number of dainty garments such as American mothers provide for their little ones. It is wrapped in any old piece of cloth that happens to be available, such as a bit of its mother's old skirt, or its father's loin-cloth, and is laid in a nest of old rags on the bamboo floor of the house.

Sometimes, indeed, it has a cradle hung from the roof, either made of bamboo splints woven to form an oval basket, or made with square corners, the bottom and upper rim being of teak-wood, and the sides of cord, knotted to form meshes like those of a large fish-net. From the time the children are born until they are well-grown boys and girls, they scarcely ever have to wear any clothes when playing about at home. They seem to like clothes as littles as an American small boy likes an overcoat, and apparently so much enjoy the freedom with which they can play equally well on land or in the water, that they would rather be cold, and sit crouched up, hugging themselves to keep warm, than put on any garments.

A Moorish Wedding Feast.

A European traveler, privileged to be a guest at a wedding in Morocco, writes a charming description of that event, in which he says: "The bridal room was almost filled with rich draperies of a dark red color set off with laces. On the floor was a thick carpet from Rabat; the walls were hung with yellow and red tapestries, and the entire wardrobe of the bride was displayed in the room. The garments were of all the colors of a bed of flowers, of woollen, silk, velvet, braided and starred with gold and silver. From this room the guests were conducted into the dining-room, where we found more carpets, tapestries, masses of flowers, grand chandeliers set on the floor, mattresses and cushions of a thousand colors placed against the walls and two beds ornamented with great luxury. Near one of the couches was prepared a table, contrary to the customs of the Arabs, who serve their dishes on the floor and eat without knives and forks. Before placing themselves at table all the party seated themselves cross-legged on the floor around the secretary of the master of the house, a handsome Moor in a turban, who prepared the tea for their use, according to custom, three cups for each, tremendously sweetened and perfumed with mint. Thrusting himself among these strangers was a little boy of four years of age, the youngest son of the house, with a shaven head and a top-knot, who occupied himself in counting furtively the fingers of the Christian guests to assure himself that they had five on each hand—just like the true believers."

After the tea every one took his place at the table. Our traveler relates that he tasted the native dishes with the greatest confidence—but the result, had he persisted, would have been something not to be comprehended. As it was, a very superficial acquaintance with a few of the dishes, convinced him that they were such as to threaten disaster to any but Moorish stomachs. There is no way of describing these dishes except to say that they were execrable! Fortunately for herself, the modest little bride remained in another part of the building with her maids and was not compelled to join in the lugubrious feast, which, to the strangers at least, was little better than torture, and they were uncomfortable until the meal was ended.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The Sky Clearing.

IN a few days Will was as vigorous and strong as ever; one morning he said to his mother, "I dread what I have to do to-day more than anything I have ever done in my life."

"My dear boy, what can that be?" asked Mrs. Mapleton.

"Why, Fred and I are to meet the Jacksons in the jailor's office, and now that I have heard the whole story, I do not know how I can contain myself in the presence of the men who have so wronged us, and Fred feels the same."

"Remember, my dear boy, what the Lord has done for us, how he has delivered us out of the power of our enemies, and that will make you willing to forgive even such as the Jacksons," said Mrs. Mapleton.

That afternoon Will said, "Mother, you were right: Fred and I went to the jail with bitterness in our hearts and disposed to avenge the wrongs we had suffered, so far as the law would allow, but when we came away there was sorrow in our hearts and a feeling of pity for the men who had wronged us."

"That makes me feel very proud of you," said Mrs. Mapleton, "although it is only a short time since I should have felt differently, and given different advice, so I thank the Lord for the change in my own heart."

"Yes," said Will, "we found Jackson, the lawyer, an utter wreck; the doctor says he will die from paresis, and his brother, my father's partner, broken in health and very penitent. He was willing and anxious to give up everything. He said liquor had been the curse of his life, that although few knew it, yet he was continually under its influence, and it made him a demon; his lawyer thinks that if we will be lenient, and not press the charges against him, that he can get him off without further punishment, as Jackson was a partner in the business, and as it was father's unbounded confidence in the man that gave him the opportunity to act as he did, so it was a breach of trust according to law, although the meanest robbery according to everything else. I thought the poor wretch would die when he saw me. He had heard I was dead, and he was so terrified that his eyes protruded from their sockets; his teeth chattered and he shook from head to foot, and we actually had to soothe him and talk kindly to him, before he could speak a word. As mine was the only name actually forged, that charge we could withdraw, and we who entered the jail burning for revenge actually left with a promise not to oppose his bail being reduced if the judge will consent, as his lawyer thinks he will. If he is liberated he can be of great help to us in straightening things out."

"I think it is the wisest course," said Fred, "the wonderful sagacity and cunning displayed by the lawyer Jackson all through the villainous transaction would make it difficult to convict, so good old Brougham agrees with Jackson's lawyer, (who, by the bye, seems an honest gentleman) that to be lenient with the wretches, both from a Christian and a business point of view, will be the best for all concerned. So we agreed that in a few days the property and the life insurance policy retransferred to you, will be in our hands. Then I must run down to New Hampshire and see my dear old father and mother. I have not let them know of my arrival home. I was determined to help Will through with this business, before I left the city again, even for a day."

"You are a very good boy," said Alice.

"Well, [illegible] Mr. Mapleton the last time I saw him, that I would stand by Will, and I have tried to keep my promise," said Fred.

"You have kept it nobly," said Mrs. Mapleton. "You stood by him when no one else could. I shall never forget that we are indebted to you for his very life. I do not understand all you are doing now. But I am quite satisfied to leave everything in your hands and his. I was never a business woman. If I had been, perhaps it would have been better; I need not then have left all the heavy burden for Alice to bear, while you were both away. But it was too late to change my nature. I shall never have any idea of business, however, and I am thankful for Alice's sake that she will be relieved of the worry. It will be better managed by you and Will. I have all confidence in you both."

"It is very kind of you to say so," said Fred. "I don't want to worry you with any business details, but it will ease your mind, after all this stringency you have passed through, to know that there is no more need for the petty economies you have had to practise. With the life-insurance which the Company would not pay to Jackson, but which it will pay to you; and with what we are certain to recover from the two conspirators, you will be independent with a good income once more. Will and I, too, have a good capital to start with. Acting on his advice, I put all the money I had, including my savings from my last enterprise, into the mine. It has proved a fortunate investment; the shares are booming now and by the time we are ready to sell are likely to be worth ten, or may be twenty times what we paid for them."

"Thank God," said Mrs. Mapleton reverently. "I believe he will enable me to make a better use of money than I did before. During my days of poverty I often thought of my shortcoming in that respect. I did not know the value of money till I saw how much good might be done with it. When Alice was obliged to go out to earn money and bear humiliations and be subjected to insults and after all, receive so little, I realized what an income was worth. It seemed to me that perhaps God had taken our property away because I had not make a proper use of it. Now he has restored it, I will mend that fault with his help. You must work with me, Alice. Let us see if we cannot make some people happy who are leading dreary lives."

"I will help you gladly, mamma," said Alice, "I am sure there are some we can help. We shall know better how to go about it after this experience. I know I should have blundered if I had tried before. I know now what poor people want, having been poor myself. And another thing is that I have a greater respect for them now. I know how good they are. They used to seem beneath me, but now I have mixed with them I find they are superior to me. They have better hearts. They will do more to help each other than rich people will. Just think, how kind that Mrs. Callaghan has been to us. I believe respecting them will go a great way toward fitting us to help them."

"Why, Alice, you talk as if you were going to be a city missionary," said Fred. "The best thing you can do, I think, is to find somebody to do all that for you. Get some deaconess and supply her with money."

"What," cried Alice, "and lose all the blessedness of labor? I shall need helpers, and I shall see that a deaconess or some one goes out with a good supply of money for emergencies; but it is not money that is needed so much as intelligent helpfulness. The people need to be encouraged and comforted and put in the way of helping themselves. I don't want to be a Lady Bountiful going around with charitable gifts. I want to be a sister to them, and tell them I have been poor myself, and know how it feels. Mamma and I will talk it all over and settle what we will do."

"And we will get Mr. Joy to help us," said Mrs. Mapleton. "I never saw any one who knew so well how to make people happy. He will tell us how we can use our money so as to do good. He has been using his money in that way a long time I understand, and he will advise us. I should like to spend all the remainder of my life in some good service. It will be a very small portion to make up for so many years of doing nothing."

"We must have Louie with us, too," Alice said. "She would like nothing better. Her mother prevents her doing many little kindnesses she would like to do. I am sure she will be with us in heart and soul. And Mr. Jacobs, the pawnbroker, would be an invaluable adviser. He knows everyone, and knows who is pressed for money, because they take their things to him to pawn. And he is such a good man. You must know him, Will. He will make you love all Jews for his sake."

"I shall be glad to know him," said Will. "It is a curious thing that Jews have a bad name, and yet every Jew I have ever known has been a kind, good-hearted man. I have met six or seven, and have seen a great deal of them, and have found them not only honest and conscientious, but ready to do any one an act of kindness who might need it. It seems you have had a similar experience. But, Alice, how did you become acquainted with a pawnbroker? Did you get so hard up as to have to get his assistance?"

"Indeed we did. And I don't know how we should have struggled through without it. Mr. Jacobs and Mrs. Callaghan were our good angels in our difficulties. I don't know which helped us most. We could not have done without either of them."

"Well, we won't forget them now," said Will. "It is rather a different line from what I expected. I thought when I began to see a prospect of restoring mamma to her old place in society, that we should resume the old life, and have parties and give dinners as we used. But I don't mind. Whatever makes you two happy is the thing for me. I have seen a good deal of all kinds of company while I have been roughing it, and I must say I prefer the plain, honest, genuine poor man and woman to the rich people who put on airs. I don't care whether a man is rich or not, if he is only genuine and sunny."

"That is my feeling, too," said Fred. "I agree with Alice about the personal work, too, as she likes it, and you may count me in heartily in any scheme for making people better and happier."

CHAPTER XXX.

The Jew's Enterprise.

Life in the tenement house, so unattractive at first, was so happy under the new circumstances, that not one of the party was in a hurry to change it. Of course, the move must come eventually, but the weeks went by and the four joyous people were still in the old quarters, with Mrs. Callaghan acting as housekeeper and rendering all kinds of friendly service. Will and Fred were away the greater part of the day "attending to business" and saying little in the evening about the kind of business they were doing or what their plans were. Fred had paid his visit to his people in New Hampshire and had returned and settled down with the Mapletons, as he said, "for good."

Alice, with no need now for toil for daily bread, had found time for a good deal of visiting in the neighborhood. Every roof covered ten or more families, and the young lady with the pleasant face, the soft musical voice, and the gentle manner had no difficulty in making acquaintances. The wives and mothers talked with her freely and the children climbed in her lap and stroked her face with loving hands.

One evening as Fred and Will were looking over some papers, and Alice and her mother were sewing, there was a knock at the door. Alice answered it and her exclamation of delight turned all eyes in that direction.

"It's the good old Jew," whispered Mrs. Mapleton to Will. As Alice led Mr. Jacobs into the room, she said, "I have just been longing to see you, and I am so glad you have come to see us."

"Vell, my tear young lady, I am glat of dat, for I vas shust tinking, vat excuse I could make for comin', only dat I want to see you, and tell you something, and ask your advice on some things."

Alice had taken his hat and cane, as Mrs. Mapleton came forward.

"You remember Mr. Jacobs, mother."

"I should be a most ungrateful creature if I did not," she said, as she shook [illegible] with the old man.

"This is my brother William late[illegible] returned from New Mexico," said Alice.

"Vell," said Mr. Jacobs," I am [illegible] to see you look so strong and health[illegible] you don't look as if you had been kille[illegible] and buried only a little while ago."

"No," said Will, as he shook t[illegible] old man's hand, "I am a pretty lively k[illegible] of corpse. I had a narrow escape but am all right now. And I am more ple[illegible] to meet you than any other man in the [illegible]; my sister has said so much abou[illegible] you, and all I can say is God bless you [illegible] the kindness and protection you gav[illegible] my mother and sister when they stood s[illegible] much in of both."

"Please do not talk dot vay any [illegible] or I vill—vat the ladies say—break do[illegible] already."

"Mr. Jacobs, this is Mr. Morgan, said Alice.

"I am only going to say 'thank [illegible] ou, Mr. Jacobs," said Fred, as he took both hands in his, "for if I should say [illegible] at I feel we should all break down, an[illegible] here were actually tears in his eyes as he spoke, and tears were on the face of the old man.

"Vell, you all make me a proud o[illegible] man and give me much astonishment, fo[illegible] am come on purpose to tank de ladies [illegible] all dey vas do for de poor peoples in dis [illegible] reet, and for myself."

"I don't remember doing anyth[illegible] for you," said Alice, "but I should like."

"Vell, den, you do plenty tings [illegible] me. Shentlemen, if you had come to di[illegible] place von year ago, you would have seen [illegible] ometings different. THE KINGDOM AND THE CHURCH.*

IT is natural that one should desire to know what is taught in the Pauline letters, and especially in the controversial group, on the subject of the Church, and in what relation the Pauline idea of the Church stands to the idea of the kingdom of God, so prominent in the teaching of Christ as reported in the Synoptical Gospels.

As to the latter topic, it is to be noted that both ideas—Church and Kingdom, and the term corresponding, occur both in Synoptic Gospels and in Pauline Epistles, but in an inverse order of prominence. Neither in the teaching of our Lord, nor in that of St. Paul do the two conceptions exactly cover each other. For both, the Kingdom possesses a certain transcendental character not belonging to the Church. This amounts to saying that it is a pure ideal hovering above the reality, or in advance of it, a goal which the Church seeks to approximate but never overtakes.

"Not in word," says the apostle (is) "the kingdom of God, but in power." It is clear that for the writer of such a sentence, at the moment, the Kingdom is not identical with the Church, but something rising far above it, ideal purity and beauty and dignity. For the statement quoted could not have been made concerning the Church as represented by the Christian community in Corinth. The very opposite was the truth as regarded it. The Church at Corinth was not word not in power. It was a society that had given up to talk, to oratory, to prophesying, to speaking with tongues. Where one phenonmenon visible there was a universally diffused talent for speech; there was sad dearth of all that tends to give a religious community spiritual power, of mysticism and charity, or even common morality. A state of things like that would permit one to distinguish between Church and kingdom, and to think of the latter as exalted above the former as far as heaven above the earth. Similar observations apply to the other text which runs: "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit." The obvious meaning is that the Kingdom ritual cleanness and uncleanness are of no account, nothing is of value there that is merely ceremonial, nothing but the moral and spiritual; the qualification for citizenship is not eating or abstaining from eating a given sort of food, but possessing a righteous, loving, sunny spirit. The men to whom belongs the Kingdom are those who have a passion for righteousness, who are peacemakers, and who can rejoice even in tribulation, because they have chosen God for their "summum bonum."

The very fact that the apostle thought it needful to make the observation just considered on, proves that the Church of Rome was far enough from realizing the idea of a community in which questions about meats and drinks were nothing, and righteousness, peace and joy in the Spirit everything.

If you are Tired

Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate

DR. W. F. HINCKLEY, Waterbury, Conn., says: "I have found it served me a good purpose when given for nervousness and physical exhaustion; also as a drink in fevers."

Pure blood and good health go hand in hand. Take Hood's Sarsaparilla for the former and the latter is assured. The weakened system needs a thorough build-up medicine like Hood's.

A New Kidney and Bladder Cure.

The new botanic discovery Alkavis, is an assured cure for kidney and bladder diseases, pain in back and rheumatism. The best proof is that the Church Kidney Cure Company, 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, will send you treatment by mail prepaid free, if you send them your name and address. Alkavis has certainly wrought some wonderful cures, and we advise our readers to try it, as it is offered free.

There were in it, on the one hand, many whose consciences were enslaved by petty scruples, and, on the other, many who treated such scruples with contempt; consequently, there prevailed a great forgetfulness in opposite directions of the great things of the law—justice, mercy and faith. Such a state of matters is a disappointing and depressing spectacle wherever exhibited, and the soul of a good man naturally takes to itself the wings of a dove and flies away in quest of a refuge from despair and scepticism to the fair kingdom of heaven, where nought but what is noble and benignant and bright finds entrance. It is well for one who lives in evil times to be able thus mentally to see the transcendent commonwealth. It is his salvation from unbelief, his quietive amid disgusts, his consolation amid disappointments and disenchantments; a temple wherein he may behold the beauty of the Lord, when there is nowhere else anything beautiful to look upon; a pavilion in which he can hide himself in the time of trouble. There is no other refuge than the Church transcendent. It thus appears that in the mind of the apostle the divine Kingdom was by no means immediately identical with the Christian Church.

THE Y. P. S. E. IN ENGLAND.

The progress of the Christian Endeavor Society in England is very marked. Nearly 2500 British branches have now been enrolled, of which seventy are in the Birmingham and District Union. In a few weeks' time the National Convention is to be held when free hospitality is to be offered by the Birmingham societies to the whole of the representatives, it is thought these will number 3000. The 3000 visitors, added to the Birmingham societies, will make a large assemblage and a huge amphitheate hars been hired for the meetings.

Nervousness

Cannot be permanently cured by the use of opiates and sedative compounds. It is too deeply seated. It is caused by an impoverished condition of the blood, upon which the nerves depend for sustenance. This is the true and only natural explanation for nervousness. Purify, enrich and vitalize the blood with and nervousness will disappear. Hood's Sarsaparilla will give vitality to the blood and will send it coursing through the veins and arteries charged with the life-giving, strength building qualities which make strong nerves.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 2

In the Preparation of Artificial Food for Infants.

Value of this Water in Diseases Incident to Teething.

Hunter McGuire, M. D., LL. D., President and Professor of Clinical Surgery, University College of Medicine, Richmond, Va., says:

"For some time I have been using BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in the preparation of artificial food for infants. Cow's milk is the substitute usually resorted to when the mother is not able to suckle her child and it is impossible to get a wet nurse. One serious objection, along with many others, to cow's milk, is its acidity. Human milk is always alkaline, but cow's milk, except when the animal is fed entirely upon grass, is almost always acid. This is the principal reason why the milk of cows disagrees with many babies, and lime water is often added to this milk to correct the acidity. I believe the long-continued use of lime water is hurtful to digestion, and last summer, when I was feeding two of my own children on cow's milk, and found the nurse adding lime water to prevent colic and intestinal derangement, which the food otherwise produced, I directed her to use No. 2 BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in preparing the food, with immediate and continued good results. The water was added until the milk lost its acidity and was neutral or alkaline."

Dr. John H. Tucker, Henderson, N. C., President of the State Medical Society of North Carolina, referring to Spring No. 1:

"I have observed marked beneficial results from BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 1, in the disorders of Teething Infants. I have sent many patients of this class to the Springs for the use of this water and, without exception, they have returned to me cured or greatly benefited."

This water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half gallon bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

CHURCH DOORS LOCKED.

ABOUT five years ago, the people of the little Alpine village of Montorfano, near Lake Maggiore, left the Church of Rome, and formed themselves into an Evangelical community. They still continued to meet in their village church for worship, but the services were Protestant instead of Roman Catholic. Mr. Henry J. Piggott, who reported the facts to the "London Christian," now tells the sequel of the story. He says: "The people regarded the the church as the property of the village, and for nearly four years their use of the building for Evangelical worship remained undisturbed.

"But, rather more than twelve months ago the bishop of the diocese interposed, and brought the case before the civil courts. I need not go into the details of the litigation that ensued; suffice it to say, that after various hearings in various courts, and various sentences, not all of which were unfavorable, the ultimate finding of the superior tribunal definitely restored the edifice to the Church of Rome, thus depriving the little community both of house of prayer and of schoolrooms, the latter forming part of the building in question.

"This issue, though grievous and disappointing, has not shaken in the least the steadfastness of the Montorfano Evangelicals. Not a member has left the church, not a child has been withdrawn from the school. The effect has rather been that of purifying and strengthening their faith in Christ, by eliminating from it all non-essentials. The sentiments of all were well expressed by one of the church, exclaimed, 'Yes, you may take from us the four walls, but you cannot take from us the precious truth we have learned within them!'

"During the winter both services and schools have been carried on in the cottages, with the variations of an occasional meeting in the open air under the chesnut-trees. An inexpensive building containing preaching-room, school-room, and a lodging for the teacher, costing about a thousand dollars is now to be erected for worship, while the fine old church of the parish stands idle with locked doors."

AN EMPEROR'S UNBELIEF.

According to an ancient tale, still preserved by Jewish chroniclers, the great Emperor Trajan affected openly to despise the God of the Hebrews. "You teach me," he said to Rabbi Joshua, "that your God is everywhere, and you boast that he resides among your nation. I should like to see him." "God's presence is indeed everywhere," said the rabbi, "but he cannot be seen. No mortal eye can behold his glory." The emperor insisted that it could. "Suppose we go first and look at one of his ambaasadors," said Joshua. They stepped into the open air. It was noonday. He bade the emperor look on the sun, blazing in its meridian splendor. "I cannot see," said Trajan, "the light dazzles me." Said the rabbi, "thou art unable to bear the light of one of these creatures; how then, could'st thou look upon the Creator?"

A PRACTICAL Y. W. C. A.

A practical proof of the value of the educational department was given a few days ago by the Brooklyn Young Women's Christian Association. The whole building was turned for the day into an exhibition, all the exhibits being the work of members trained in the Association's classes. Millinery, dressmaking, typewriting, embroidery, cooking and other departments were represented. In the evening there was an exhibition given by the members of the gymnasium and of the class of nurses.

MISSIONARY'S KIND WELCOME.

In a letter from Tongoa, in the new Hebrides group of islands, South Pacific, Mr. Oscar Michelsen, a missionary, gives a pleasing description of his reception by the chief and people of Sakan, one of the islands. Mr. Michelsen and his party went to Sekan on the Mission boat "Viking," which had been built for them in Norway. He writes:

A crowd of the 'barbarians' were standing ready on the beach, and as soon as they saw us they rushed out in the surf to carry our cargo and ourselves safe ashore. The women gathered — rather shyly — around Mrs. M., who, of course, was a stranger to most of them. 'Oh!' they exclaimed, 'she has got a baby!' The rejoicing was almost unbounded, when one of them said, 'It is black!'—it being a Tongoan baby, whose mother died, and which Mrs. M., had adopted. Whilst we were receiving their greetings, the boatmen had succeeded in floating the 'Viking' in to the beach, and had sails, oars, masts, etc., taken out and placed on shore. There was no want of willing hands ready to volunteer to carry our stuff to our house. Everything looked clean and swept and tidy. The people evidently had taken advantage of the short waiting they had had. Our stuff reached the house before us, and was only waiting our orders about where everything was to be placed. Things were temporarily put into our dining-room, the food-box got hold of, and in a wonderfully short time we sat down to a refreshing cup of tea.

Being very tired, we decided to retire early, so as to have a good night's sleep and rest. We soon found out, however, that we were no longer at our Tongoa station situated 430 feet above the sea), with its large and airy rooms. The air was close and hot, and we were tossing about, in vain hope to get to sleep. We had not lain long when we heard a strange noise near baby's cradle. The candle was lit and a search was made. The disturber of the peace was a large land crab. I made him a prisoner under a wire meat cover until the morning. We were just dozing off when a violent earthquake shook us quite out of our sleep for some time.

The next couple of days were almost entirely taken up with receiving visitors, accepting and giving presents, and shaking of hands. Although these natives have a little Maori blood in their veins, they have never learned to rub noses, and it is just as well. The back yard of our station is shaded by a large orange tree. Here they laid down large heaps of yam, taro, bananas, sweet potatoes, breadfruit, pumpkin, melons and other fruits, each village putting their gifts in a separate heap, the piece resting under the orange tree, whilst a bit of rice was cooked for every company, and a present of a shirt and a fathom of turkey red twill was got out as a gift to the chief. Though these presents did not come very cheap, it was a decided expression of their goodwill, so we may well say with Paul, 'the barbarous people showed us no little kindness.' During the following day much food was brought for sale, so that we were soon able to send a load of food to our station on Tongoa, which it would tide us over two or three weeks of this time of famine."

to concentrate their nervous force in mental work to the utter neglect of their physical welfare, and in a short time they suffer from debility, exhaustion, mental depression, etc., and are obliged to yield to restless, sleepless prostration. Rev. J. R. Miller, of the Erie Conference, M. E. Church, wrote Oct. 24, '92: "I broke down because of overwork, my nervous system being overtaxed. But I kept on until completely overcome. I tried several physicians; traveled and took medicine of all sorts without relief, until I took Dr. Miles' Nervine which cured me." April 10, '95, Dr. Miller wrote: "I have done full work on an important charge, and my health has been good ever since I took the Nervine."

CUBA'S WAR FOR FREEDOM.

"The Gem of the Antilles" Once More the Scene of Revolution — Its Long Struggle to Shake off Spanish Control—Why the Cause of Christianity has Languished on the Beautiful Island Photographic Glimpses of Cuban Homes and Scenery.

CASTILLO DEL MORRO
The Fortress Commanding Havana Harbor.

ONCE more the standard of revolt has been unfurled in the mountains and plains of Cuba, the loveliest, yet most unfortunate of the group of islands that compose the West Indian archipelago. Like a slumbering volcano, the elements of civil strife are ever in a state of ferment and unrest, and the intervals between armed uprisings there have not been of long duration.

Several notable revolts against Spanish rule in Cuba can be remembered by the present generation, but few have attained such formidable proportions, or held out such alluring promises of success for those who have been offering out their lives and their substance in the hope of securing the ultimate establishment of a free Cuban Republic. Although the policy of our own government is one of strict neutrality, a very large portion of the American people have on repeated evidence of strong sympathy with the movement to liberate the island from monarchical rule. Several expeditions have been recently fitted out by American sympathizers and have landed in Cuba and cooperated with the insurgents, although such ventures have been undertaken in defiance of neutrality laws. The condition of the war in Cuba is greatly obscured by the conflicting reports that are circulated concerning every incident of consequence in the campaign. Martinez Campos, the distinguished soldier whom Spain sent out to supersede a weak and incompetent Governor General, was welcomed with enthusiasm in Havana, as it was believed he would adopt summary measures to end the rebellion forthwith. Yet the reports of patriot victories have been received with unfailing regularity. Bands of insurgents under Gomez, Marti, and other leaders have conducted a guerilla warfare which has placed the government's imported troops at a disadvantage, and kept them constantly in dread of ambushes and surprises. Only a few encounters of importance have taken place, but no general engagement, and in all the fighting thus far, according to insurgent reports, the patriot cause has held its own.

On the other hand, government reports claim that Gen. Campos is gradually crushing out the revolution. So much faith has the Madrid government in his military ability and the ultimate triumph of his plans, that it is supplying money and troops for the Cuban war on a scale of extraordinary liberality. Campos has conducted the war with vigor and determination, and has already succeeded in making himself exceedingly obnoxious to the insurgents by reason of his severe military measures. A large part of the island is under martial law, and in some provinces the people have been warned that it will be unsafe to venture out of doors between nightfall and sunrise. Meanwhile, the commerce of Cuba is practically paralyzed by the war, and the fine plantations are suffering greatly through neglect. Many of the loyal planters have suffered from insurgent raids, involving widespread destruction of property. Government supply teams have been stopped and seized. The patriot forces—numbering in all not more than 15,000 or 18,000—are operating in small bands in different parts of the island in a manner that renders it impossible to foretell where the next blow will fall. The war is costing Spain $125,000 per day, and Cuba probably quite as much, through commercial blockade and injury to property. As a whole, the situation is such as to excite genuine alarm in Spain, and all the more so that her strongest soldier, General Campos, has thus far failed to

THE GATES OF HELL.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it." Matthew 16: 18.

ENTRANCED, until we could endure no more of the splendor, we have often gazed at the shining gates, the gates of pearl, the gates of heaven. But we are for awhile to look in the opposite direction, and see swinging open and shut the gates of hell.

I remember, when the Franco-German war was going on, that I stood one day in Paris looking at the gates of the Tuileries, and I was so absorbed in the sculpturing at the top of the gates—the masonry and the bronze—that I forgot myself, and after awhile, looking down, I saw that there were officers of the law scrutinizing me, supposing, no doubt, I was a German, and looking at those gates for adverse purposes. But, my friends, we shall not stand looking at the outside of the gates of hell. In this sermon I shall tell you of both sides, and I shall tell you what those gates are made of. With the hammer of God's truth I shall pound on the brazen panels, and with the lantern of God's truth I shall flash a light upon the shining hinges.

Gate the first: Impure literature. Anthony Comstock seized twenty tons of bad books, plates, and letter press, and when our Professor Cochran, of the Polytechnic Institute, poured the destructive acids on those plates, they smoked in the righteous annihilation. And yet a great deal of the bad literature of the day is not gripped of the law. It is strewn in your parlors; it is in your libraries. Some of your children read it at night after they have retired, the gas-burner swung as near as possible to their pillow. Much of this literature is under the title of scientific information. A book agent with one of these infernal books, glossed over with scientific nomenclature, went into a hotel and sold in one day a hundred copies, and sold them all to women! It is appalling that men and women who can get through their family physician all the useful information they may need, and without any contamination, should wade chin deep through such accursed literature under the plea of getting useful knowledge, and that printing-presses, hoping to be called decent, lend themselves to this infamy. Fathers and mothers, be not deceived by the title, "medical works." Nine-tenths of those books come hot from the lost world, though they may have on them the names of the publishing houses of New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia. Then there is all the novelette literature of the day flung over the land by the million. As there are good novels that are long, so I suppose there may be good novels that are short, and so there may be a good novelette, but it is the exception. No [illegible] reads the average novelette of this day and keeps either integrity or virtue. The most of these novelettes are written by broken-down literary men for small compensation, on the principle that, having failed in literature elevated and pure, they hope to succeed in the tainted and the nasty. Oh! this is a wide gate of hell. Every panel is made out of a bad book or newspaper. Every hinge is the interjoined type of a corrupt printing-press. Every bolt or lock of that gate is made out of the plate of an unclean pictorial. In other words, there are a million men and women in the United States to-day reading themselves into hell! When, in one of our cities, a prosperous family fell into ruins through the misdeeds of one of its members, the amazed mother said to the officer of the law: "Why, I never supposed there was anything wrong. I never thought there could be anything wrong." Then she sat weeping in silence for some time, and said: "Oh! I have got it now! I know, I know! I found in her bureau after she went away a bad book. That's what slew her." These leprous booksellers have gathered up the catalogues of all the male and female seminaries in the United States, catalogues containing the names and residences of all the students, and circulars of death are sent to every one, without any exception. Can you imagine anything more deathful? There is not a young person, male or female, or an old person, who has not had offered to him or her a bad book or a bad picture. Scour your house to find out whether there are any of these adders coiled on your parlor centre-table, or coiled amid the toilet set on the dressing-case. I adjure you before the sun goes down to explore your family libraries with an inexorable scrutiny. Remember that one bad book or bad picture may do the work for eternity. I want to arouse all your suspicions about novelettes. I want to put you on the watch against everything that may seem like surreptitious correspondence through the post-office. I want you to understand that impure literature is one of the broadest, highest, mightiest gates of the lost.

Gate the second: The dissolute dance. You shall not divert me to the general subject of dancing. Whatever you may think of the parlor dance or the methodic motion of the body to sounds of music in the family or the social circle, I am not now discussing that question. I want you to unite with me this hour in recognizing the fact that there is a dissolute dance. You know of what I speak. It is seen not only in the low haunts of death, but in elegant mansions. It is the first step to eternal ruin for a great multitude of both sexes. You know, my friends, what postures, and attitudes, and figures are suggested of the devil. They who glide into the dissolute dance glide over an inclined plane, and the dance is swifter and swifter, wilder and wilder, until with the speed of lightning they whirl off the edges of a decent life into a fiery future. This gate of hell swings across the Axminster of many a fine parlor, and across the ball-room of the summer watering-place. You have no right, my brother, my sister—you have no right to take an attitude to the sound of music which would be unbecoming in the absence of music. No Chickering grand of city parlor or fiddle of mountain picnic can consecrate that which God hath cursed.

Gate the third: Indiscreet apparel. The attire of woman for the last few years has been beautiful and graceful beyond anything I have known; but there are those who will always carry that which is right into the extraordinary and indiscreet. I charge Christian women, neither by style of dress nor adjustment of apparel, to become administrative of evil. Perhaps none else will dare to tell you, so I will tell you that there are multitudes of men who owe their eternal damnation to what has been at different times the boldness of womanly attire. Show me the fashion-plates of any age between this and the time of Louis XVI., of France, and Henry VIII., of England, and I will tell you the type of morals or immorals of that age or that year. No exception to it. Modest apparel means a righteous people. Immodest apparel always means a contaminated and depraved society. You wonder that the city of Tyre was destroyed with such a terrible destruction. Have you ever seen the fashion-plate of the city of Tyre? I will show it to you:

"Moreover, the Lord saith, because the daughters of Zion are haughty and walk with stretched-forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet, in that day the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires like the moon, the rings and nose jewels, the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crisping-pins."

That is the fashion-plate of ancient Tyre. And do you wonder that the Lord God in his indignation blotted out the city, so that fishermen to-day spread their nets where that city once stood?

Gate the fourth: Alcoholic beverage. Oh! the wine-cup is the patron of impurity. The officers of the law tell us that nearly all the men who go into the shambles of death, go in intoxicated, the mental and the spiritual abolished, that the brute may triumph. Tell me that a young man drinks, and I know the whole story. If he becomes a captive of the wine-cup, he will become a captive of all other vices; only give him time. No one ever runs drunkenness alone. That is a carrion-crow that goes in a flock, and when you see that beak ahead, you may know the other beaks are coming. In other words, the wine-cup unbalances and dethrones one's better judgment, and leaves one the prey of all evil appetites that may choose to alight upon his soul. There is not a place of any kind of sin in the United States to-day that does not find its chief abettor in the chalice of inebriacy. There is either a drinking-bar before, or one behind, or one above, or one underneath. These people escape legal penalty because they are all licensed to sell liquor. The courts that license the sale of strong drink, license gambling-houses, license libertinism, license disease, license death, license all sufferings, all crimes, all despoliations, all disasters, all murders, all woe. It is the courts and the Legislature that are swinging wide open this grinding, creaky, stupendous gate of the lost.

But you say, "You have described these gates of hell and shown us how they swing in to allow the entrance of the doomed. Will you not, please, before you get through the sermon, tell us how these gates of hell may swing out to allow the escape of the penitent?" I reply, but very few escape. Of the thousand that go in, nine hundred and ninety-nine perish. Suppose one of these wanderers should knock at your door, would you admit her? Suppose you knew where she came from, would you ask her to sit down at your dining-table? Would you ask her to become the governess of your children? Would you introduce her among your acquaintanceships? Would you take the responsibility of pulling on the outside of the gate of hell while the pusher on the inside of the gate is trying to get out? You would not, not one of a thousand of you would dare to do so. You would write beautiful poetry over her sorrows, and weep over her misfortunes, but give her practical help you never will. But you say, "Are there no ways by which the wanderer may escape?" Oh, yes; three or four. The one way is the sewing-girl's garret, dingy, cold, hunger-blasted? But you say, "Is there no other way for her to escape?" Oh, yes. Another way is the street at leads to the river, at midnight, the en of the city dock, the moon shining dow on the water making it look so smooth e wonders if it is deep enough. It is. No hu man near enough to hear the plunge. No watchman near enough to pick her ou fore she sinks the third time. No ther way? Yes. By the curve of the rai ad at the point where the engineer of the lightning express train cannot see a hun ed yards ahead to the form that lies acros the track. He may whistle "down brak" but not soon enough to disappoint the ne who seeks her death. But you say, "Isn't God good, and won't he forgive?" Yes: but man will not, woman will not, so ty will not. The church of God says it will, but it will not. Our work, then, mu be prevention rather than cure.

Those gates of hell are to be pros ted just as certainly as God and the Bib are true, but it will not be done until Chr ian men and women, quitting their pruder nd squeamishness in this matter, rall the whole Christian sentiment of the C rch and assail these great evils of society The Bible utters its denunciation in this ec tion again and again, and yet the pi of the day is such a namby-pamby s of thing that you cannot even quote Scr ure without making somebody restless As long as this holy imbecility reigns the Church of God, sin will laugh you to rn. I do not know but that before the C rch wakes up, matters will get worse nd worse, and that there will have to b one lamb sacrificed from each of the mos are-fully-guarded folds, and the wave u cleanness dash to the spire of the age church and the top of the cathedral to er.

Prophets and patriarchs, and apostl and evangelists, and Christ himself have un dered against these sins as against n oth er, and yet there are those who thi we ought to take, when we speak of thes subjects, a tone apologetic. I put my f on all the conventional rhetoric on thi subject, and I tell you plainly that unle you give up that sin your doom is seale and world without end you will be chased the anathemas of an incensed God. I ral you to a besiegement of the gates of hell We want in this besieging host no sof entimentalists, but men who are willing t take and give hard knocks. The gates Ga za were carried off; the gates of Sebe were battered down; the gates of B ylon were destroyed, and the gates of h are going to be prostrated.

The Christianized printing press l be rolled up as the chief battering-ram. hen there will be a long list of aroused pits, which shall be assailing fortresse and God's red-hot truth shall be the flyi am munition of the contest; and the ispers and the miners will lay the train nder these foundations of sin, and at j the right time God, who leads on the fr will cry, "Down with the gates!" and e ev plosion beneath will be answered by t the trumpets of God on high, celebrati uni versal victory.

But there may be one wandere that would like to have a kind word lling homeward. I have told you that ciety has no mercy. Did I hint, at an arlier point in this subject, that God wi have mercy upon any wanderer who wou like to come back to the heart of infinite ve?

A cold Christmas night in a farm ouse. Father comes in from the barn, kno s the snow from his shoes, and sits down the fire. The mother sits at the stand k tting. She says to him, "Do you rememb it is the anniversary to-night?" The fa er is angered. He never wants any allus n to the fact that one had gone away, nd the mere suggestion that it was the anni sa of that sad event made him quite although the tears ran down his The old house dog, that had play with the wanderer when she was a child omes up and puts his head on the old han s knee, but he roughly repulses the d wants nothing to remind him of th anni versary day.

A cold winter night in a city chu It

Christmas night. They have been dec-ting the sanctuary. A lost wanderer of t street, with thin shawl about her, at-cted by the warmth and light, comes in d sits near the door. The minister of re-ion is preaching of Him who was wound-e for our transgressions and bruised for d iniquities, and the poor soul by the door id: "Why, that must mean me; 'mercy f the chief of sinners; bruised for our in-ities; wounded for our transgressions.'"

The music that night in the sanctuary ught back the old hymn which she used sing when, with father and mother, she rshiped God in the village church. The rvice over, the minister went down t aisle. She said to him: "Were those rds for me? 'Wounded for our trans-ssions.' Was that for me?" The man God understood her not. He knew not w to comfort a shipwrecked soul, and he ssed on and he passed out. The poor nderer followed into the street.

What are you doing here, Meg?" said t police. "What are you doing here to-ht?" "Oh," she replied, "I was in to rm myself;" and then the rattling cough ne, and she held to the railing until the roxysm was over. She passed on down t street, falling from exhaustion; recov-ng herself again, until after a while she ched the outskirts of the city, and pass-on into the country road. It seemed so miliar; she kept on the road, and she w in the distance a light in the window. h! that light had been gleaming there ery night since she went away. On that ntry road she passed until she came to t garden gate. She opened it and passed n the path where she played in childhood. e came to the steps and looked in at the f on the hearth. Then she put her fingers t the latch. Oh, if that door had been ked she would have perished on the reshold, for she was near to death! But t door had not been locked since the e she went away. She pushed open the or. She went in and lay down on the rth by the fire. The old house dog wled as he saw her enter, but there was mething in the voice he recognized, and frisked about her until he almost pushed r down in his joy.

n the morning the mother came down, d she saw a bundle of rags on the hearth; t when the face was uplifted, she knew and it was no more old Meg of the street. rowing her arms around the returned digal, she cried, "Oh, Maggie!" The ld threw her arms around her mother's ck, and said, "Oh, mother!" and while y were embraced, a rugged form tower-above them. It was the father. The verity all gone out of his face, he stooped d took her up tenderly and carried her to other's room, and laid her down on moth-s bed, for she was dying. Then the lost e, looking up into her mother's face, said: 'Wounded for our transgressions,' and uised for our iniquities!' Mother, do you nk that means me?" "Oh, yes, my rling," said the mother. "If mother is glad to get you back, don't you think d is glad to get you back?"

And there she lay dying, and all their eams and all their prayers were filled with e words, "Wounded for our transgres-ns, and bruised for our iniquities," until, st before the moment of her departure, r face lighted up, showing the pardon of d had dropped upon her soul. And there e slept away on the bosom of a pardon-g Jesus. So the Lord took back one om the world rejected.

BOWERY MISSION PATRONS.

THE following persons have sent in their names for enrollment as Patrons of the wery Mission during the past week:

Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Fairbanks, Mass.
S. E. Butterworth, Pa.
Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Lewis.
J. S. Knapp.
L. F. F., Verdon, Neb.
Miss Eleanor Cole, N. J.
C. Pierce.
Dr. O. C. Tarbox.

All desiring to be enrolled on the list of trons, should send the names and ad-resses to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The True Missionary Call.

Rev. Henry H. Jessup of Beirut, Syria, One of the Grandest of Modern Missionaries, Explains its Meaning.

UNDER consecrated missionary zeal, a great part of the heathen world has already been won for Christ, and it is not, therefore, surprising that there should be a burning desire, on the part of many Christian young men and women, to enter the missionary field. Many letters asking for information as to the duties of and qualifications for such service are received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and we take pleasure in giving space to the following eminently practical suggestions on this subject, from the pen of a distinguished missionary, Rev. Henry H. Jessup, D.D., of Beirut, Syria. Dr. Jessup enumerates twelve classes of men who should not go to the mission field, viz.:

1. Those in infirm health. It is not wise to send invalids so far away from home. No one should go who cannot pass the examination of a Medical Examiner.

2. Those too old to learn a foreign language. It is not often that one over thirty can master a difficult foreign language. As a rule it is better to send the young to grapple with Zulu clicks, Arabic gutturals, and Chinese characters.

3. No one should go who is unwilling to go anywhere. There should be complete self-surrender. The wise and experienced officers of our Mission Boards are always ready to consider the personal preferences of candidates for special fields. But the true spirit of a missionary is one of readiness to go "where duty calls or danger," making no conditions.

4. Those who believe that the missionary enterprise is doomed to failure. It is a winning cause. Expect to succeed. Omnipotence is on your side. If you expect only disaster, retrogression and final collapse, and can only look on the dark side, do not go abroad to cast the gloom of your pessimism over your fellow laborers and finally sink in despair.

5. Impatient men. It is a long hard work and needs patience. You must prepare the soil, sow the good seed, water it with your tears, and then wait for the harvest. Be willing to sow and to let others reap. An impatient man is easily discouraged. The Lord's patience is great. If he can wait for the harvest, his servants can.

6. Men without common sense. This is a virtue the want of which nothing else will supply. Brilliant talents, great linguistic gifts, impetuous zeal, all will fail without mental balance. A man without level-headed common sense will do more mischief in a day than a whole mission can undo in a year. Religious enthusiasm has led some to go abroad, despising the means God has given us for preserving life and health, and they have sacrificed their own lives and the lives of others and given occasion to the enemies of God to blaspheme. Some of them have become a charge on other missionaries.

7. Intractable men. Such men cannot yield to a majority vote. They are not needed abroad. The work needs tractable, courteous men, willing to take advice and to work with others. One self-opinionated, arbitrary, wilful man will bring disaster upon a mission. Missions are self-governing bodies, and the majority must decide every question.

8. Superficially prepared men. No one can predict what duties may devolve on a foreign missionary: Bible translation, organization of churches, the moulding of a new native Christian social fabric, dealing with subtle philosophies, preparing a Christian literature, founding institutions of learning, and perhaps a whole educational system, guiding the ignorant, and oftentimes dealing with kings and rulers. Surely such a man should be well trained. If a physician, he should be thoroughly equipped, and not be satisfied with any short, hasty course of preparation. He should be able not only to secure the Diploma of a Medical College, but pass the test of examination by the New York or Massachusetts State Board of Examiners. The most complete all-round, theological or medical training, is the best preparation for the foreign missionary work. To this should be added, experience in personal Christian work in the cities or the country.

9. Men of unsettled religious views. The foreign mission work needs men who believe something, who are anchored to the Rock, who believe in the Bible, and in Christ as the only Saviour. If you do not know what you believe, stay at home until you do.

10. Men who are afraid of torrid climates and hard languages. There is nothing in these to alarm a Christian soldier.

11. Men who hesitate to condescend to the lowly, depraved and besotted. The unevangelized nations are not all besotted and repulsive in their habits, but there are tribes of half-naked, filthy and imbruted children of nature from whom a civilized man involuntarily shrinks. Yet they are men for whom Christ died. Can you go and live among such men and women? Do you say, I am not called to such a degradation, this is too great a sacrifice, too exacting a condescension? Think what Christ has done for you.

12. Lastly, men who think of the missionary work as a temporary service, or a convenient way of serving themselves. Some men have entered the foreign missionary work in order to study foreign languages and fit themselves for a position at home; or in order to travel in foreign parts; or to engage in mere scientific exploration, or commercial pursuits. Such men do not deserve the name of missionaries. The missionary work should be, if possible, a life work. If you go abroad, expect to spend your life among the people, and to identify yourself with them. Let nothing turn you aside from your work. Missionaries are sometimes tempted to leave their work by the allurements of literature, diplomacy or commerce. But none of these things should move them. If you go abroad, hold on to your work until the Lord himself separates you from it.

THE WASHINGTON CENTRAL UNION MISSION'S GOSPEL WAGON.

If then the Christian student finds that he is of sound health; of proper age; willing to go where God shall call; hopeful; patient; with good common sense; tractable; thoroughly trained; of settled religious views; willing to go to the most trying climate and learn the most difficult language; ready to love the humblest and the most degraded; and to make his work a life service; it is evident he is called of God to go. He needs no voice or sign from heaven. If you have sufficient reason to justify your remaining at home it will always be a blessing to you that you considered the question of duty fairly, fully and faithfully. You will be more useful as a pastor at home, if you are willing to go, and found yourself detained at home by the constraints of the Divine Providence.

A MAMMOTH GOSPEL WAGON.

PERHAPS the largest wagon ever used in Gospel work in the United States is the vehicle just finished by a firm of Washington carriage builders for the use of the Central Union Mission in its religous work in the National Capital. The design of this vehicle, together with its many conveniences and general utility, constitute a genuine novelty in Gospel wagon building. The central part of the panel on the right hand side of the wagon can be lowered, forming a platform which has an iron side-rail and is self-adjusting. The entrance to the wagon is by a door on the left side of the body, with steps that fold on the inside when the door is shut. An iron frame is attached to the top, to which the curtains can be fastened, forming an awning to protect the speakers and singers from the sun's rays.

The interior of the wagon is fitted up with three rows of folding chairs, affording seating capacity for thirty-three people. A necessary interior fixture is a handsome organ. The wagon is provided with poles, lead bars for two, three, four or six horses. The following are the principal dimensions of this Gospel wagon:

Its length over all is twenty feet, width seven feet, and length of top twenty-four feet. The illustration is from "The Carriage Monthly of Philadelphia, Pa.

CONVERTS IN CHINA.

Several missionaries of the China Inland Mission are now taking their periodical vacation. They report progress in their various fields in spite of the miseries resulting from the war, and the prejudice against foreigners it has engendered. Mr. C. H. Judd, whose field is in Shau Tung, says that one of his most active supporters is a beggar-woman, who was brought under the influence of Christianity during a sickness.

When she recovered she resumed her occupation and proved a grand evangelist, carrying the Gospel news as she tramps from village to village, so that even in far-off farmhouses the name of Jesus has become known. Another man actually turned his home into a "Jesus Hall," and afterward gave a piece of land for a chapel, a great gift for a Chinaman, because it is his living, the ground on which he grows his rice. In one place, where there was at first much oppostion, twenty-five were lately baptized in one day, many of them being spiritual children of the man who gave the land to the Christian cause.

THE GOLDEN CALF.

S. S. Lesson for July 14. Exod. 32: 1-8. Golden Text I. John 5:21. By Mrs. Baxter.

"LITTLE children," writes the old apostle John, "keep yourselves free from idols." (I. John 5 : 21). What is an idol, and what is idolatry? An idol is anything which we allow to take the place which God ought to take, and idolatry is to give to the creature the attention, the time, the consideration, the honor, which is due to God. Man is finite, but God has created him with capacity to take in, and to appreciate the infinite. It is in the very nature of man to seek, outside of himself, Something to Worship.

If he finds a being superior to himself, his worship elevates him. If he does not find God and learn to worship his Saviour, he degrades himself by creating an idol, and offering senseless homage to the work of his own hands—to his inferior. The origin and worship of the golden calf in the wilderness is full of precious instruction for us.

The law of God had been given amid the thunders and lightnings which issued from the Mount Sinai, which was shaken to its base by the presence of the holy God. Many most beneficial rules for the welfare of the people had been communicated by God to Moses, and he had commanded the observance of three feasts yearly, the Passover, Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles, that their deliverance from Egyptian slavery, their tribute of praise to the Lord as the giver of the fruits of the earth, and the fact that they were pilgrims and strangers on earth, should be each year commemorated.

It was at this time that God instituted the worship of his people: "Let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them" (Exod. 25 : 8). Here is a direct renewal of his great purpose to bring man near to himself, so that man might really and truly draw nigh to God, and have directly to do with him. In the innermost part of the tabernacle, in the holy of holies, God directed Moses to make an ark of wood, which should be overlaid with gold, within which the tables of the law should be kept. A wondrous type of him who became flesh, wood and gold, human and divine. God's own Son, who, as man, had God's law within his heart. And a covering must be made for the ark; a mercy seat of pure gold; and of the same pieces of gold, "of the matter of the mercy seat" (Exod. 25 : 19, Marg.). Should he make two cherubim of beaten work, prefiguring glorified human beings, made "partakers of the divine nature" (II. Peter 1 : 4); "of one piece with the mercy seat" (R. V.). It was a witness, hidden away from the people, who yet knew that the cherubim were there, although they might not look upon them, that God meant to unite man to himself.

Moses understood his God, but the people did not. Forty days and forty nights (Exod. 24 : 18) of drinking in the thoughts and purposes of God, was none too long for this man "whom the Lord knew face [illegible] upon his God. The people were not easily governed; of this he already had had abundant proof in Egypt at the Red Sea, at Marah, in the wilderness of Sin, and at Rephidim. And yet this man of God, who "endured, as seeing him who is invisible," could with confidence leave them while God called him to abide in the mountain in his presence. He had learned a lesson which many, even in these days of the indwelling of the Holy Ghost, have not learned—that the highest of all service is to [illegible] and give time to him to speak; and that in so doing when he calls for attention, other work which is committed to him is not really neglected. He cares for it.

To human eyes, the absence of Moses was a fatal mistake, and was the cause of their idolatry. When the people saw that he delayed to come down from the mountain, they "gathered themselves together unto Aaron, and said unto him: Up, make us gods which shall go before us; for as for this man Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him." "What madness," human reason would argue, "to leave such a people for such a length of time to themselves! Of course mischief would come of it." And there is truth in the argument: evil did come of it. And yet God permitted it; his purpose with his people was not to obtain an easy, unquestioning obedience to a routine of duties, in quiet, undisturbed peace, settled upon their lees. No; God's object is to redeem, and conform to himself, a people which shall be an everlasting proof that sin and Satan are overcome, and that from redeemed man he has been able to form one helpmeet for him.

Aaron was now put to the test; this could not have been if Moses had been at hand to refer to. What should Aaron do? All the people were aroused; how should he, alone and unaided, manage them at so critical a juncture? Aaron had not learned Moses' lesson, to endure "as seeing him who is invisible;" he was on earthly ground, his brother was on heavenly. Moses had given a command to the seventy elders: "Tarry ye here for us until we come again unto you; and, behold, Aaron and Hur are with you; whosoever hath a cause, let him come near unto them." (R.V.)

in the place where they had seen the God of Israel, apart from the people. Could it have been that, in the first instance, Aaron himself with the elders manifested impatience at the prolonged absence of Moses, and returned to the camp? Might not this have led to the people's impatience?

In any case we find them now not tarrying in the mountain, as commanded, but among the people who gathered themselves together unto Aaron. It was a time of crisis. Wherever a crisis had arisen before, Moses had fallen on his face before God, and Aaron had followed his example. Now, in the absence of his brother, Aaron does not do this, neither does he tarry till the return of Moses. The flesh cannot wait. "Something must be done," is always the impulse of human energy; "We cannot leave things as they are, such and such is sure to happen if we do not do all we can to prevent it." Idolatry was in the people's hearts, and Aaron's preventive measures only fostered, and brought to a head, the sin which, probably, he sought to hinder. Moses always believed in the power, the will, the presence of God to undertake in a difficult moment. Aaron, now he was put to the test, fell back upon himself. Practically ignoring God, the impatience to do something or to have something is the sure way to idolatry. The people had ample proof of the reality of God, who had wrought such wonders in Egypt at the Red Sea, and in his providing for them up to this very day; they had every proof, too, that Moses was really sent of him, but in their childish petulance and irreverent unbelief, they must have some visible thing to satisfy their senses, and a Religion Pleasing to the Flesh.

Aaron fell under the people's influence, and requiring from them their jewelry, made them into a molten calf, and said: "These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt." He attempted, probably, to make a compromise; they should have something to see, that their senses might be gratified, and so he could keep a hold on them. And he built an altar before it, and proclaimed on the morrow a feast to the Lord. This was just what the people wanted, a religion which could minister to their senses, in which they might have entertainment connected with religion, and which they were occupied in gratifying themselves, could flatter themselves that they were, nevertheless, superior to the heathen, because their golden calf was a kind of representation of God. Oh how near the churches of this day approach to this idolaty of Israel. "We must have something to draw the people," say pastors and elders who have not learned to endure as seeing him who is invisible: and they do draw the people to church theatricals, and church concerts, and to a love of pleasure which prepares them to appreciate the theatre, the ballroom, and the gambling dens; but they do not draw them to the Lord, and a simple, faithful preaching of the Gospel palls upon their taste.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE GOLDEN CALF.

IN the extraordinary lapse into idolatry, which is the subject of the lesson, are several practical suggestions, which may be usefully turned to account. One refers to the circumstances. One would have thought that a people who had been just delivered from bondage in so striking a manner, and had within a few days witnessed so terrifying a spectacle as that accompanying the giving of the law, would not easily and soon have been drawn aside into so heinous a sin. But experience proves that reaction is an inevitable sequence of exaltation; and there is no time when it is more necessary to be vigilant than after some peculiarly impressive events. Another suggestion comes from the contrast in the character of the two chief figures in the story. Aaron was the speaker, the man of eloquence. Moses was the quiet, meek, praying man. It was to Aaron, in the absence of Moses, that the people went with their wicked proposal. We can imagine the kind of reception they would have had if they had made such a suggestion to the younger brother. It is not always the most gifted man or the finest orator that is the safest guide. A great historian, indeed, contended that, almost invariably, the most famous orators had been in the wrong. He mentions as an instance Demosthenes, who in arousing his countrymen to fight Philip, led them into misfortune. Another suggestion arises out of the excuse Aaron made, when his brother reproached him for his wrongdoing. He said that he put the gold in the fire and there came out the calf. In other words, the fire was to blame. When people are reproached for their wickedness, they often say, it is my strong passions, my constitution, my early education, my position, or my companions. But the excuse, though it may have been technically true, was a lying evasion. Aaron had made use of graving tools in the manufacture of the calf, and so now, people lend themselves readily and willingly to the gratification of their propensities, and instead of resisting the evil within them and around them, make deliberate and conscious efforts to provide the gratification. The particular form of idolatry was doubtless due to Egyptian association. At On, or Heliopolis, which was near the country identified with Goshen, where the people had lived in Egypt, there was just such an idolatrous image. It was called Mne or Mnevis, and was a golden ox. Apis, the bull-god, is pictured on t hieroglyphs as black, but Mne is alwa drawn in a yellow color. It is improba that the image was solid gold. It is m likely to have been wood covered w gold. The fact that Moses destroyed it fire and flung the ashes into the wate people drank, implies that it was not all gold. His indignation and the ease w which he stemmed the tide of idolatry one man against half a million—shows h one strong, faithful man at a national cri may save a whole nation from going on the commission of a great evil.

All the people brake off their earrings. P haps Aaron thought that they would no willing to make the the sacrifice and so might escape from his dilemma. If so was the resort of a weak man and failed such resorts generally do. People will m sacrifices for superstition or sin that t would not make for Christianity. H much the idolater will sacrifice for relig was seen at the building of the great Bu hist temple at Kyoto, Japan, when the panese ladies had their long black hair which they are very proud, cut off, to m the ropes for hoisting of stone and timb

WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BY

Margaret E. Sangster.

THE FOURTH AT MILLER'S.

MILLER'S Junction was an out-of-the-way place, where the traveler who had to spend a night by reason of missing his connection on the road, generally bewailed his fate, and did not in the least know how he should pass the tedious time away. Only a few houses were in sight from the little station, which was itself store, post-office and hotel. Beyond, a straggling road was fringed by a blacksmith's shop, a cottage or two, an old church, and a small weather-beaten building, where the children of the township went to school. Back of Miller's was a farming country, where people lived as best they could, wrenching by hard toil enough to support their families from a stony and stubborn soil.

One day in June, the train stopped at Miller's and two passengers alighted. They were an old man and a young girl, the latter very pretty indeed, and very daintily dressed, as even the few loungers at the station perceived, though they could not even guess remotely the cost of a tailor-made gown from a London and New York maker, nor the price of such a hat and such gloves as finished off the costume of an extremely stylish young woman. Not her clothes, however, nor her trim, shapely figure, nor her quick, crisp manner of speaking, struck the men who watched her, an unaccustomed sight in that lonely spot, so much as her face, a face of rare attractiveness. Such eyes, like stars, great glowing brown eyes, with arching brows and sweeping lashes, such a color, pink as the inner heart of an old-fashioned blush rose, such hair, parted and falling on either side of a lovely forehead; seldom does one see beauty so perfect, and to see is to yield one's homage to it, as to the sceptre of a queen. Then, her voice, a deep, soft, vibrant contralto, which had a tender thrill in its tones, as she spoke to her grandfather, quite fascinated the little listening group. "You are too tired to go on, my dear," she said with decision, "and we will stop here and rest over the Sabbath. I think this is a beautiful place, grandfather. We will find some quiet house nearby where we can stay, if you don't want to be close to the railroad. This gentleman," turning as she spoke to the station-agent, and making a little, courteous bow, "may be able to tell us of a farm-house, or a kind woman in the neighborhood, whose home will accommodate strangers."

The old man, who was white-bearded and pale, a man whose four-score years weighted him with many infirmities, sank into a wooden arm-chair which stood out of the sun, and left every arrangement to the young lady. She had the air of managing affairs to suit herself, and looked quite fearless and resolute, yet withal had a simple child-likeness about her, which pleased the group of spectators, and made them anxious to serve her. Somebody brought a glass of cold water from the well with its moss-oaken bucket, and offered it to the old man, who accepted the drink with grateful thanks.

"Do as you think best, Irene," he said, "and make your own arrangements. Our tickets are here, I believe."

"Yes, grandfather," she answered, "and the tickets allow our stopping-over if we like."

The station-agent doubted, surveying the town-bred pair, whether they would find what they wanted, in the line of comfort at Miller's Junction, and advised their going to Jillton, twenty miles farther on, where there was a fine inn, and many people stopped on account of the springs, but Miss Irene had made up her mind, and as Jake Lent observed aside to Tom Lent, "that young woman does as she's a mind to."

"No mistake in that, Jake," said Tom, approvingly.

The end of it was, that Tom and Jake presently led the way to Doctor Rabeau's in the village, a little distance from the station. Mrs. Rabeau, they thought, had two spare rooms, and once in a while she would take a boarder.

"Grandfather," said Irene, the next morning, "I wonder what pleasure people have in such a lonesome bit of a place as this. I never before saw a place where I thought nothing ever happened. It's like the line in the poem, 'land where it is always afternoon.'"

"That is why you wanted to stay, was it, dearest? To have a new experience?"

"Yes, and really, dear granddaddy, to let you get your breath. You were worn out with the long jolting of the train."

"And now, what do you propose, Irene?"

"Our tickets will let us remain until July 5. I mean to get up a Fourth of July celebration at Miller's, if you'll give me leave."

"Irene McDermott!"

"Yes, dear grandfather! Please let me. I want to try what I can do, in this line, as I am going to make it my business after awhile to speak in public, and read at Chautauqua assemblies, and I'd like to try my powers."

"I believe in your powers, dearie. But these people here may not."

"They will probably like anything which will stir them up. I'll go and interview some of the principal people of the neighborhood, after supper, in the long twilight, while you are reading your CHRISTIAN HERALD."

Irene went to call at the minister's, and the teacher's, and had a little conference with the Sunday School superintendent. The result was gratifying. She found that there was plenty of patriotism in the little community, and more than one plain household had its cherished flag, flung to the breeze on the nation's holy days, which are also its dear holidays. The minister and his young young wife entered heartily into her plan, and when she told them that she had studied elocution and given readings at home, they were pleased to hear that she wished to do this and break up the monotony of their life, even though it seemed to be only for the gratification of a caprice.

She explained that they were jaunting here and there for her grandfather's health and pleasure, and that she had a fancy to see the obscurer localities en route. The celebration would cost nothing, but everybody must take part, and lend a hand.

The Fourth was only a week in advance of them, when Irene set things in motion. But a week will do as well as a year and better when go-ahead people are concerned.

Flags were borrowed and the school house was decorated with ropes of evergreen, and draped with our beloved red, white and blue. Flowers were brought from woods and fields, great masses of rhododendron, white and pink, and bunches of white and golden daisies. The old school house looked like a bower of bloom and beauty. Notices were given in church, and posted in the station, and on a big tree at the Four Corners, that on the morning of the Fourth, there would be a celebration at Miller's. Miss McDermott from New York to give patriotic recitations, and singing by the children and the choir, to complete the occasion.

The day arrived. A small cannon ushered it in with salutes, and the church bell rang in merry peals. The children mustered and walked two and two to the school house, the boys in their best, the girls in white frocks with bright sashes. Miss McDermott, in a white gown with a silk flag crossed over her breast, represented the Goddess of Liberty, and led in the opening anthem, "My Country 'tis of Thee." Then the minister prayed and read a chapter, and Archie Loomis, a young man of the village, played a medley of patriotic tunes, "Yankee Doodle," "Hail Columbia," "The Star-Spangled Banner," and "Rally Round the Flag, Boys," on his violin. Mr. MacDermott followed in a brief but eloquent speech, and the pastor then read the Declaration of Independence. After this, the choir sang a hymn, and Miss Irene McDermott recited a poem, written by a friend for such occasions as these:

Dear land of mountain and of lake
Of valleys sweet, of breezy plains,
Dear land, which at its need can make
What call it please on men it trains;
We love its fair, uplifted skies,
Its breadth, its cheer, its happy homes;
Beneath the smile of God it lies,
And still to it his blessing comes.

Dear land, where freedom fills the air,
And learning thrives, and labor wins
The guerdon it was meant to share,
Dear land, where one who toils and spins,
May wear the purple of a queen;

AT THE PARLOR WINDOW OF A CUBAN HOME.

Where poor and rich together stand,
And give their voice, unmoved, serene,
And by the ballot, sway the land.

For thee we pray, for thee we live,
Dear mother of a dauntless brood,
And all our best we haste to give,
And crown thee with our highest good.
Be other lands as proud and strong
As age and might can make them, we
In cheer and gladness, swell the song,
And praise our land of liberty.

The cap-sheaf of enjoyment was put on the Fourth at Miller's, when old Mr. MacDermott distributed fire-crackers and torpedoes with a liberal hand among the children, who were not slow in using them in true Independence Day style. Long after the Fourth had gone, there were those who remembered and were happy on account of the jollification at Miller's, all due to the visit of two kind strangers, who went on their journey after it, and saw Miller's no more.

Cuba's War for Freedom.

reduce the island to submission. He has found it impossible to prevent the landing of supplies and troops for the insurgents, and the present prospects indicate that the revolt may be prolonged many months. Several somewhat noted military leaders have already fallen in the war, one of the principal victims being the insurgent leader, Jose Marti, who was betrayed by a Cuban spy. The casualties in the field have been light, and the deadly yellow fever is claiming more victims among the recently imported Spanish troops than the Cuban bullets.

Although the revolt has been largely confined to the Eastern part of the island, it is causing the deepest anxiety at Havana. The regular military garrison has been greatly strengthened and the defences of Morro Castle the dark, frowning fort that commands the bay and offing, are manned to their utmost capacity. The usually gay capital has lost much of its charm in consequence of the war.

A CUBAN SUGAR PLANTATION NEAR HAVANA.

Our illustrations, procured specially for this journal, include a scene on the beautiful avenue that looks to the Castillo del Morro on the West of the harbor of Havana. A sugar plantation is also shown, with its buildings wherein the cane is prepared and the sugar made ready for market. El Morro itself is pictured on the first page. One picture represents a typical young Cuban girl in the graceful mantilla worn by women of Spanish blood the world over. Another shows how the windows of a Cuban parlor have to be guarded with stout iron bars, like a prison, against an attack from without. This is a common precaution in Cuban houses owing to the frequent civil disturbances.

Cuba, "the gem of the Antilles," is the largest and richest island of the West Indian group. It has an area of 43,222 square miles. Discovered by Columbus, it was afterwards taken possession of by Spain. It is claimed that there does not now remain a single trace of its original inhabitants, and that the name of the island is the only existing reminder of a period prior to the Spanish conquest. It is a most beautiful country, possessing a delightful variety of scenery, and a climate that is accounted by many as one of the most perfect in the world. With less than 2,000,000 population, including Spaniards, negroes, Chinese, Europeans, and Americans, and with several handsome cities, many evidences of wealth, culture, and refinement, and manifold natural advantages, Cuba's progress has been retarded by many causes, chief among which was the curse of human slavery, which was abolished by statute in 1886. Another, is the social exclusiveness of the aristocratic "upper" classes, whose pride and arrogance toward all other classes have opened a constantly-widening chasm. Laboring under such disadvantages, the Cuban people as a whole have made slow progress in education and religion. The island was priest-ridden for generations, and although freedom of worship is granted to all, the moral and spiritual condition of the people is low. Brutal bull-fights form one of the principal amusements.

Protestant Missionary work in Cuba is represented by the American Baptist Missionary Society, which has seven stations, twenty workers, and over 1500 members in congregation. The Jamaica Baptist Missionary Society is also doing excellent work there. Under its present control there is little hope of improvement, but were the island free, it is more than probable that, with a constitution patterned after that of our own Union, and a system of popular education, a higher enlightment and a nobler national life would soon follow.

A DIP IN THE SEA.

SHAKESPEARE has been fiercely mauled by the critics for confusion of metaphor in speaking of taking up "arms against a sea of troubles." The smart fellows say, how could a man take "arms against a sea?" in other words, it is not possible to shoot the Pacific Ocean. But what Shakespeare suggests is, this jocund weather, being done all around the coast from Florida to Newfoundland; especial regiments going out from Cape May, Long Branch, East Hampton, Newport, and Nahant; ten thousand bathers, with hands thrown into the air, "taking up arms against the sea." But the old giant has only to roll over once on his bed of seaweed, and all this attacking host are flung prostrate upon the beach.

The sensation of sea-bathing is about the same everywhere. First you have the work of putting on the appropriate dress, sometimes wet and chill from the previous bathing. You get into the garments cautiously, touching them at as few points as possible; your face askew, and with a swift draft of breath through your front teeth, punctuating the final lodgment of each sleeve and fold with a spasmodic "Oh!" Then having placed your watch where no villainous straggler may be induced to examine it to see whether he can get to the depot in time for the next train, you issue forth ingloriously, your head down in consciousness that you are cutting a sorry figure before the world. Barefoot as a mendicant, your hair dishevelled in the wind, the stripes on your clothes strongly suggestive of Sing Sing, your appearance a caricature of human kind, you wander up and down the beach, a creature that the land is evidently trying to shake off and the sea is unwilling to take. But you are consoled by the fact that all the rest are as mean and forlorn-looking as yourself; and so you wade in, over foot top, unto the knee, and waist deep. The water is icy-cold, so that your teeth chatter and your frame quakes, until you make a bold dive; and in a moment you and the sea are good friends, and you are not certain whether you have surrendered to the ocean or the ocean has surrendered to you.

At this point begin the raptures of bathing. You have left the world on the beach, and are caught up in the arms of experiences that you never feel on land. If you are far enough out, the breaking wave curves over you like a roof inlaid and prismatic, bending down on the other side of you in layers of chalk and drifts of snow, and the lightning flash of the foam ends in the thunder of the falling wave. You fling aside from your arms, as worthless, amethyst, and emerald, and chrysoprase. Your ears are filled with the halloo of sportive elements, and your eyes with all tints and tinges, and double-dyes and liquid emblazonment. You leap and shout and clap your hands, and tell the billows to come on; and in excess of glee greet persons that you never saw before and never will again and never want to, and act so wildly that others would think you demented but that they also are as fully let loose; so that if there be one imbecile, there are a whole asylum of lunatics. Swept hither and thither, you find, moving in reel and cotillion, saraband and rigadoon and hornpipe, Quakers and Presbyterians, who are down on the dance. Your sparse clothing feels the stress of the waves, and you think what an awful thing it would be if the girdle should burst or a button break, and you should have, out of respect to the feelings of others, to go up the beach side-wise or backward or on your hands and knees. Close beside you, in the surf, is a Judge of the Court of Appeals, with a garment on that looks like his grandmother's night-gown just lifted from the wash-tub and not yet wrung out. Yonder is a Doctor of Divinity, with his head in the sand and his feet beating the air, traveling heavenward, while his right hand clutches his wife's foot, as much as to say, "My feet are useless in this emergency; give me the benefit of yours."

Now a stronger wave, for which none are ready, dashes in, and with it tumble ashore, in one great wreck of humanity, small craft and large, stout hulk and swift clipper, helm first, topsail down, forestaysail in tatters, keel up; everything gone to pieces in the swash of the surges. Oh the glee of sea-bathing! It rouses the apathetic. It upsets the supercilious and pragmatical. It is balsamic for mental wounds. It is a tonic for those who need strength, and an anodyne for those who require soothing, and a febrifuge for those who want their blood cooled; a filling up for minds pumped dry, a breviary for the superstitious with endless matins and vespers, and to the Christian an apocalyptic vision when the morning sun gilds the waters, and there is spread before him "a sea of glass mingled with fire." "Thy way, O God, is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters!"

WINDOW GARDENING.

SOCIETIES for promoting this beautiful art have been established in England, and here and there in America. Why not more of this. Here and there a tasteful person adorns the window with a cluster of fuchsias or geraniums; but why not have our streets lined with floral beauty? We may not have yards in which to cultivate plants, but we all have window-sills. A methodical and organized effort would make our brick walls blossom into Paradise. A box, a shovelful of rich earth, a few shrubs bought or solicited, and a Christian desire to "consider the lilies of the field," might bring thought of heaven even into Wall street. Lambrequins and Sevres ware and pencilled porcelain are pleasant in a window, but a flash of gladiolas, petunias, portulacas, verbenas, and trumpet-creepers on the wall would make it seem as though the River of Beauty from under the throne were rolling down the street and dashing its spray clear up to the window casement.

MORE MOMENTUM.

THE Church needs a change in quality as well as quantity of membership. One-half the professed Christians amount to nothing. They go to church. They pay pew rents. They have a kind regard for all religious institutions. But as to any firm grip of the truth, any enthusiastic service for Christ, any cheerful self-denial, any overmastering prayer, any capacity to strike hard blows for God, they are a failure. One of two things these half and half professors ought to do, either withdraw their names from the Church-roll or else go into action. Do you not know that your present position is an absurdity? You profess to be living for God and heaven, but all the world knows you are lying. Wake up! Do something before you are dead. Either help pull the Lord's chariot, or get out of the way. We want more old-style holiness, the kind they had before railroads, steamboats, and telegraphs. A consecrated heart is momentum for all Christian work. Your gun is well enough, but the gun-carriage is rickety, and so unfit for the Lord's battery. The Lord give us all a higher life, a deeper life, a broader life. We cannot do much toward saving others till we ourselves are more surely saved. We cannot pull others out of the surf when our own feet are slipping on the rock. More purity, more faith, more consecration will be more momentum.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Subscriber, Viking, N. Dak. What death did John, the beloved disciple of Jesus, die?

He is said to have died a natural death at a very old age.

Bertha Smith, Pitts, Pa. What is the origin of the Bible? By whom was it written, and at what time were the different books of the Old and New Testament compiled or put together?

The question is too comprehensive to be disposed of in the limited space at THE MAIL-BAG'S disposal. You should buy and read "The History of the English Bible," by Patteson, published by C. E. Barnes, Philadelphia; or "Our Sixty-six Sacred Books: How they Came to us and What they Are," by Dr. E. W. Rice. Published by the American Sunday School Union, Philadelphia.

Reader, Greencastle, Ind. What may I tell my four-and-one-half-year-old daughter, when she asks me if she has already given her heart to Jesus? She seems to be quite anxious about it, but she is so young I hardly know what to tell her. Yet if I tell her to wait until she grows older, the habit of "putting off" may grow upon her.

There is no need to tell her to wait. She can learn to love Jesus now and give her heart to him, quite as readily as she can learn to love you, if you will tell her all about him and how you yourself love him. The childish heart is full of sympathy and the simple story of the Babe of Bethlehem, the Boy of Nazareth, the Saviour of the world in Gethsemane and on Calvary, will awaken in it, the purest love and devotion. The knowledge that Jesus loves her is the greatest joy that can enter a child's heart. Many eminent ministers have declared that those who are converted in childhood make, as a rule, the best Christians.

C. C., Tenn. I have been deeply distressed by reading Heb. 6:4-7, and other passages warning people who have backslidden that there is no hope for them. I am more in earnest now in repentance and desire God's favor, than I was ever before, but fear that I am lost. What do those passages mean?

The fact of your being sincerely penitent and concerned about your salvation proves that they do not apply to your case. The persons to whom they apply are cold and indifferent. Your sorrow shows that the Holy Spirit is still influencing you and that God will receive you if you go to him and ask forgiveness. The passages you refer to are given in warning to the careless, not as a barrier to the return of the penitent backslider.

Anna Spatchholds, Schoharie, N. Y. Who was King David's mother and where is she mentioned in the Bible?

The name of David's mother is nowhere positively stated. Some commentators have expressed the opinion that she was formerly the wife of Nahash—presumably an Israelite—to whom she bare Abigail and Zeruiah, and that these as daughters of Nahash and sisters of David, caused the impression that Nahash—a man's name distinctively—was the name of David's mother.

R. R. Mills, Bryan, O. Why is it that so few paintings of Christ give him the Jewish features? Is it not true that tradition gives his personal appearance as more that of a Saxon than a Jew—more of the North European than the Oriental? Are such traditions considered well founded, and if they were true, would it not be a partial explanation of the animosity of his own people? As the Saviour of the world and not of the Jews only, it would not seem strange if, as a man, he should represent largely the Gentiles, combining the best of all races in his person.

It is true that the old painters, whose master-pieces still adorn the great cathedrals and galleries of Europe, rarely represented Christ as a typical Hebrew. They preferred to paint their own ideal, and to portray Christ in that style of physical beauty which appealed more directly to their own taste and that of the western European dignitaries and cities. Some of those painters even went so far in deferring to this taste, as to be guilty of gross anachronism in the treatment of their subjects, complexion, costume, surroundings, etc. There is no substantial reason for believing that Jesus was of Saxon rather than Oriental type, and we should regard all tradition on the subject as lacking reliability and scarcely entitled to consideration.

W. H. George, Miller's Creek, Va. For what purpose was the Tower of Babel built and why were the languages confounded?

The design of the builders is stated (Gen. 11: 4), to have been a desire to possess a structure so large and high that it might be a rallying point in the great plains in which they had settled, and might prevent them from being scattered abroad. A more ambitious motive, however, is also imputed (Gen. 11: 6, 7), which was divinely ordained that instead of congregating in a single location, with one speech common, men should be distributed throughout the habitable portions of the globe. A tradition asserts that one object in building the Tower was to be beyond the possibility of destruction by another flood; but this is improbable in view of the promise that there should be no more general destruction of the race by water.

A. A. Riddick, Suffolk, Va. Was the portrait of Peter, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of [illegible] 5th, a reliable portrait, and are there any others in existence?

We described the portrait as "the traditional portrait of Peter." It is not known if it is reliable. The original of it was on the bottom of a drinking glass which was discovered in the catacombs at Rome. The word "Petrus" was engraved over it, and it is probably the most ancient portrait in existence and the one most likely to be reliable.

J. G. A., Marysville, Mo. 1. Is there any way of finding out what became of the ten tribes? 2. Is the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus to be regarded as fact or parable only?

1. There is no doubt they were absorbed among the nations. A large number of students believe that the Anglo-Saxon race is descended from them, but there are weighty reasons for doubting the claim. 2. There is no reason for supposing it is more than a parable.

John Bowen, Carbon, Ind. 1. Did our Lord, in referring to the man born blind, John 9: 3, mean that he and his parents were absolutely sinless? 2. Why did Christ weep at the grave of Lazarus?

1. No, his statement: "Neither hath this man sinned," etc., must be taken in connection with the question to which it was a reply. The disciples wanted to know whether his affliction was a punishment for his own sin or some sin of his parents. Christ's reply practically told them that it was not a punishment at all. Neither the man nor his parents had sinned with that effect. 2. Probably from human sympathy with the grief of his sisters. A benevolent person about to relieve a stricken family feels sorrow for the suffering he is causing to terminate. Christ was doubtless affected by the sorrow he was about to turn into joy.

W. E. Voss, Thurston, Okla. Ter. How many years were employed in writing the Bible and how long a period elapsed between the beginning and end of the work?

The number cannot be known. The books of Judges, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles and the Psalms were certainly the work respectively of more than one hand, but of how many it is impossible now to determine. The date is also uncertain. Parts of the Pentateuch were doubtedly written by Moses who is believed to have been born about seventeen hundred years before Christ. The epistles of John were probably written nearly a hundred years after Christ, which would make the period about eighteen hundred years. The age of the book of Job is thought by some scholars to be greater than that of the Pentateuch, but this is not the general opinion.

Mrs. A. L. Freeman, Mayfield, Kans. 1. Were Jesus between the ages of twelve and [illegible]? 2. Did Divinity suffer when he was crucified?

1. We know nothing of Christ's life except from the four evangelists and as they are silent about that period, it is impossible to answer the question. The fact that the people of Nazareth spoke of him as "the carpenter," (Mark 6: 3), and not as the carpenter's son, would appear to imply that he worked at the trade in Nazareth. But that is a matter of inference only. 2. It is difficult to understand the union of the divine and the human in the person of Christ. Whatever suffering, if any, the Divine nature endured must have been purely voluntary. In the Garden, Divinity must have suffered extreme anguish.

J. C. R., Altoona, Pa. 1. Did John's baptism belong to the Old or the New Dispensation? 2. Is it probable that he used any formula such as we now use? 3. If a nurse knows that a truthful answer will retard the recovery of a patient, is she possibly cause death, is she justified in telling a lie?

1. John the Baptist belonged to the Old Dispensation. Christ's reference to him (Matt. 11), is decisive on that point. 2. Certainly not the formula now in use. Probably no formula at all. Those who went to him for baptism were simply indicated by the rite their repentance and desire to lead a more holy life. 3. A lie is never justifiable. The nurse should refuse to avoid answering; but if an answer must be given, it should be the truth whatever the consequences may be.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE SULTAN'S SUBMISSION.

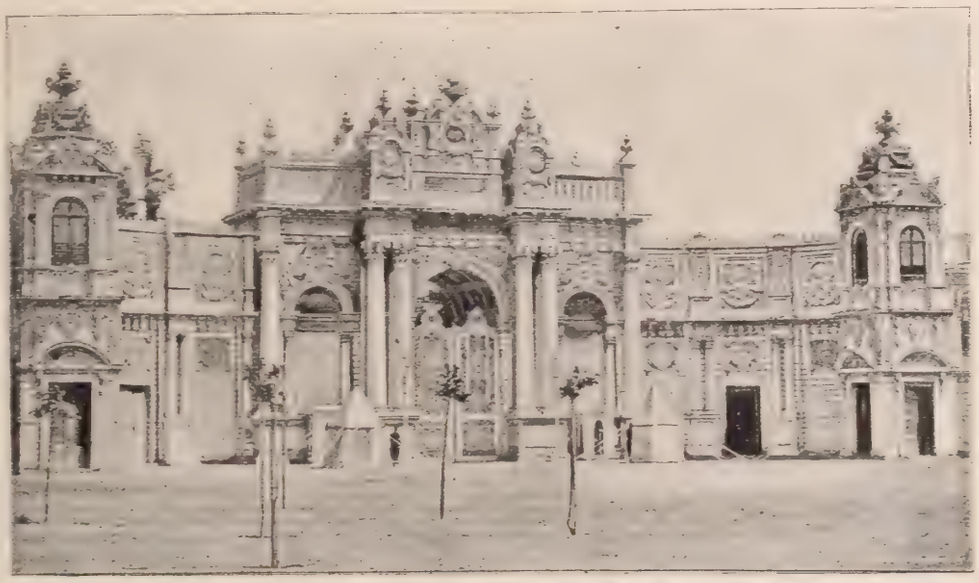
NEWS of the Sultan's consent to the demands of England, France, and Russia, has given general satisfaction throughout the civilized world. The condition of Armenia under Turkish rule has long been a bandal to Christendom. The recent investigation of the latest atrocities showed that the Armenians had been wantonly tured and murdered, and that indescribable atrocities had been perpetrated. Men, men, and children were proved to have been hacked to pieces, and no respect had been shown to age or sex. Whole villages had been depopulated, and the fact of any community being Christian seemed to have been sufficient to provoke the murderous hostility of the authorities. Where the Kurds did not commit the outrages themselves, they remained inactive while the Kurds committed them, and their inactivity amounted to connivance, because the Armenians are not allowed to arm themselves for their own protection. There was legitimate grounds for foreign powers urging reforms upon the Sultan, as in 1878, when the Berlin Congress was inclined to trip him of his Armenian provinces, he promised that Armenia should be governed better than it had been, and England became sponsor for the performance of his promises. Under those conditions the Sultan was allowed to retain the provinces, and his failure to effect the reforms was therefore a distinct breach of faith. The Ambassadors of England, France, and Russia accordingly presented to the Sultan on May 11 a demand for twelve specific changes in the government of Armenia, one of which was the organization of a High Commission of Surveillance, on behalf the members of which should be Christians, and the Commission was to have charge of the reforms to be instituted. The Sultan's reply was eagerly anticipated, but when it came, it was practically a rejection of the demand. There must have been some exciting scenes in the palace on the Bosphorous after the Sultan's reply was dispatched. The Sultan would be anxious to know what the three powers would do about it. He was not kept long in suspense, so far as England was concerned. Orders were issued to the English fleet to proceed to Constantinople, and France and Russia were informed of the fact. The news reached the Sultan and appears to have convinced him that it was not safe to trifle any longer with the demands of the powers. He accordingly telegraphed that he would accede to the principle of reform outlined for him. Possibly the Sultan imagined he could do as he chose in his own provinces, and the Armenians in despair may have thought so, too; but both are learning that there are none so great but there is One higher still who takes cognizance of cruelty and oppression.

"... that is higher than the highest regardeth."

The Nest Saved.

A lady living near Macon, Ga., tells an interesting story of an emergency in bird life which occurred a few days ago on her husband's plantation. She had been interested in the work of two mocking birds who built their nest in a slender young elm tree just opposite the window of her room. Before an egg had been laid in it, a violent storm came. The elm was tossed this way and that, and the nest was completely destroyed. With patient persistence the birds went to work and soon had their nest rebuilt in the same crotch. Two eggs were deposited therein, and the lady watched with interest the tiny home life of the birds. One day lately she noticed that they were in great excitement. A strong wind had sprung up, and they evidently feared another catastrophe to their home, which would now be more disastrous than before. Presently the male bird flew away, leaving his mate sole protector of the home. The lady's sympathy with the poor, distressed little creature grew intense, and she felt indignation against the bird who had deserted her. But soon he reappeared with two orioles, who had their nest in an orchard on the other side of the house. They had evidently been summoned as experts, and their ability was soon proved. After looking over the situation, they flew about in search of something. In a few minutes they were seen bearing a piece of twine between them. They had found it on the ground, and it suited their purpose. They dropped it over a twig of the elm just above the nest. They then seized the loose ends in their bills and flew with them to the adjacent rose lattice and twined them firmly around the lattice, thus holding the limb securely in position. Ministers and Christian friends have often done a similar kindness to families in distress, in the storms of life, by leading them to the only safe anchorage, of which the Psalmist said:

He is my rock and my salvation; he is my high tower. I shall [illegible] greatly moved. Psalm 62 R.V.



ENTRANCE TO THE DOLMA-BAGTCHE PALACE OF THE SULTAN OF TURKEY

A Race With Fire.

A startling discovery was made on board the steamer, "Yumuri," of the Ward line, on June 20, while it was on its way from Havana to New York. Two ladies who occupied a cabin in the forward part of the vessel, asked permission to change their quarters on account of the intense heat. Their complaint surprised the captain, but he readily granted their request, and after finding them a cabin farther aft, ordered an investigation made as to the cause of the unusual heat. He received the alarming report that the hemp, which formed the chief part of the vessel's cargo, was on fire. A quantity of water was pumped into the hold, but it was not possible to extinguish the fire. The Captain was fearful of alarming his passengers, of whom there were about forty on board, so did not inform them of the danger. He had all the lifeboats provisioned and got ready for lowering in the event of the fire getting beyond control. All speed was made in the endeavor to reach port. At last the cloud of smoke rising from the deck made further concealment impossible. The passengers were told that the ship was on fire, but that the captain felt sure of reaching New York within twenty-four hours, and that the fire could be kept under until that time. There was some alarm, but no panic, and the vessel reached her dock safely, but with her deck almost red hot, and the smoke issuing from every crevice. It must have been an anxious time for the Captain, and probably he was never before so glad to reach port. There are some who make the voyage of life under analogous circumstances. The fierce fires of evil passions in their nature continually threaten to break out and bring their life to disastrous wreck. Even the great Apostle found perpetual vigilance necessary. He said:

I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection, lest by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway. 1 Cor. 9:27

Undeserved Censure.

A great deal of indignation was aroused among the passengers on a street car in Portland, Me., one day recently by the behavior of a man who was riding on it. He had a beautiful little girl about two years old on his knee who looked very tired and sleepy. She was wailing miserably, but the wails would occasionally cease and her pretty golden head fall towards her father's shoulder. At these times the man would shake her and compel her to sit upright and then she would begin to cry again and beg with sobs and tears to be allowed to rest. The child's distress was noticed by every one on the car and the passengers frowned at the man and one and another whispered that it was a shame such a brute should have the care of the pretty little girl. At last, one sympathetic lady could restrain her indignation no longer, and asked the man why he was so hard-hearted to his child. "Why," said he, "I am obliged to keep her awake. She has swallowed some kind of a drug, and I am taking her to the hospital. If she goes to sleep she will die." There was, of course, an instant change of opinion in the car as to the man's treatment of his child. It was seen that in continually disturbing her and not allowing her to rest he was giving the best proof of his love for her. Perhaps when we know more than we do now of God's ways, we may find it not so difficult to reconcile the fact of his love with the afflictions that are often more numerous in the lot of the Christian than in the lot of other men.

As an eagle stirreth up her nest ... so the Lord alone did lead him. Deut. 32:11, 12.

To Save a Train.

A collision was arranged on the Central Railroad of New Jersey on June 17, as the means of averting a fatal disaster. A car was being laden with coal at the Franklin mine and was nearly full, when the fastenings, which kept it stationary, parted, and the car ran with terrific velocity down the incline to the main track. By the time it reached the level, it had attained the speed of sixty miles an hour. It passed South Wilkesbarre at that rate and the telegraph operator there sent word ahead to clear the track. But an east-bound passenger train was approaching and there were no means of stopping it in time to avert a collision. In the emergency a switch-engine was run out on the main track and left there in the way of the runaway car. In another minute the car dashed against the engine with such force that both were wrecked and there was only just time to clear the tracks before the passenger train passed. The officials wisely deemed it better to sacrifice an engine, costly as it was, to save the train with its living freight. The principle of sacrifice to avert calamity appears to be inwoven into all affairs of life. Its supreme example ought therefore not to be so difficult of belief as it appears to some. Caiaphas spoke more truly than he knew, when he said:

It is expedient for us that one man should die [illegible]

SERMONS WORTH READING

HELPFUL DISCOURSES FOR THE PEOPLE

THE SAVING NAME.

A Sermon by Rev. J. B. Hawthorne, D.D., of Atlanta, Ga. Text: "Thou shalt call his name Jesus: for he shall save his people from their sins." Matt. 1:21.

TRULY there is something in a name. It may, and often does, represent a mighty factor in the life of the world. Back of all the world's history there were names that inspired human courage, purpose, and enterprise. The names of great men have become synonyms for the principles and institutions to which they devoted their lives. They have become slogans, watch-words, and battle-cries to arouse the enthusiasm of men, and to nerve them for heroic action in the midst of great crises. When the old Greek orators saw signs of dullness and inattention in their audiences, they could arouse every man before them, and raise enthusiasm to the highest pitch, by simply pausing for a moment, and then shouting, "Marathon! Marathon!" Since the day you first read the history of that struggle which culminated in the independence of the American Colonies, and the establishmene of the American Republic, the name of Washington has stood in your mind for patriotism, and the mention of it has stimulated your patriotic sentiment. That name has ever been a favorite countersign with American soldiers, and the use of it has helped many a weary, hungry, half-clad and shivering picket to stand at his post, and watch the stars out in the midst of a merciless blizzard.

The day I was born my father named me for Boardman, that dauntless hero who preceded Judson in missionary work among the Karens. When I was old enough I read the history of the struggles, sufferings, and achievements of that brave young man. His name, which I unworthily bear, has been to my soul an abiding and Unfailing Inspiration.

Luther, Calvin, Knox, Bunyan, and Carey were long ago gathered to their fathers, but the power of their names is still evoked wherever Christian workmen need a higher courage, a steadier purpose, and a more fervent zeal.

But there is a name above every name—a name which is reconstructing our disordered planet, re-creating our fallen and ruined humanity, and which stands everywhere for the sweetest charities of earth, the synonym of the purest life, and the symbol of the highest civilization—a name which carries healing to the wounded, rest to the weary, pardon to the guilty, and salvation to the lost—a name which makes the dark gate-way of the tomb the portal to a temple resplendent with the glory of Celestial light, where the music of golden harps by angels' fingers touched is ineffable and eternal. "There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." Jesus himself stood up among men and boldly declared that he was the one and the only way by which lost men could get back to God.

But in what sense is he the Saviour of men? A mistake is radical and fatal. Is he simply the ideal man, showing by his own manner of living how other men ought to live? If he is no more than that, he is not the Saviour that we need. He is indeed the ideal man. His life was perfect. It was [illegible] and he [illegible] of reproducing his virtues. But, if he is only the ideal man, and does no more for us than [illegible] our necessities. Setting before us an example of right-living, and inviting, entreating, and commanding us to follow it, will not save us from our sins and restore us to the favor of God.

Nor is he the Saviour of men in the sense that he shows them the way of salvation. If he is only a law-giver, or a teacher of divine truth, or a finger-board to direct us in the way of righteousness, he is insufficient for our needs. The man who shows me the way to New York is not himself the way. The person who merely teaches me the truth is not himself the truth. And if Jesus is only a teacher of the way of salvation, he is not himself salvation. It is true that man is sadly and fearfully ignorant both of himself and of the infinite God to whom he must give account for the deeds done in the body; and it is also true that by coming to Christ he can be relieved of this ignorance. But if Jesus is only a pedagogue, or schoolmaster, he does not touch the deepest necessity of man's condition. Such a view of him may improve a man's morals, and elevate him somewhat in other respects, but it can never save him from the power and consequences of sin. Jesus is which he taught the race, and which he commissioned his disciples to preach. He is the wisdom, the grace, the mercy, and the power that save men from their sins. The saved man is not he who attempts merely to copy the virtues of Jesus, nor he who merely accepts his doctrines, but the man who trusts him, as the little child trusts its mother when it lies helpless and peaceful in her arms.

No man can have a true conception and appreciation of the mission of Jesus until he comprehends man's condition and necessities as a sinner. Sin is no idle fancy or innocent hallucination with which circus clowns, street-venders of patent medicines, low comedians, and peripatetic infidel buffoons may with impunity amuse themselves and the frivolous people who listen to them. Sin is the most terrible fact in the universe of God. It is the intolerable burden of a soul that is destined to live forever. It is a black darkness which invests man's whole moral being, and conceals from his vision everything that belongs to the highest and grandest realms of reality. It is a disease that is converting him into a lump of rottenness and a feast for "the worms that dieth not." It is a fiend that has bound him hand and foot, and that is dragging him down and down to a region of infernal flames. From such a power man can be delivered only by the personal intervention and act of a personal God of infinite mercy and might.

The sense of sin is not something into which we, who live in a Christian country, have been educated. It is and inheres in the very inmost nature of man. Wordsworth voiced the truth when he said, "The recognition of the fact of universal wrong-doing is perfectly independent of Christian teaching." Every man who has even a general acquaintance with the world's history, knows that every ancient religion and philosophy grappled with the problem of sin. All the records that we have of the races and tribes which have dwelt upon the earth, show that men have ever been conscious of sin, and that sin is a stern fact of human nature which no people have ever been able to ignore or reason away. Men have never ceased to think, and talk, and write about it, because in every generation, and in every region of the earth, it has shadowed their path-way and burdened their hearts.

Buddhism antedates Christianity nearly six centuries, and Buddhism is as full of the doctrine of sin as the religion of Christ. Homer, the father of poetry, sang of sin and the wretchedness it had made. Sophocles, as he thought of the misery born of human depravity, declared that the best thing for man was death. Whether you read Greek poetry, Greek history, or Greek philosophy, you find not only lamentations over the woes of man, but a distinct recognition of the fact that all man's woes are traceable to human sin.

Sin figures in all the great poems and dramas that men have written. A semi-infidel critic has had the candor to confess that "a guileless hero would be no hero for a drama." Eliminate the part which sin plays in Homer's immortal Iliad, and how much of it would be left? Take the thieves, hypocrites, liars, adulterers, conspirators, and murderers, out of Shakespeare's tragedies, and who would go to a theatre to see them performed? There is in every man's bosom a tribunal which pronounces judgment on his conduct, and by which he is made to know that sin is a terrible reality. Or, as Tennyson has expressed it:

> He ever bears about
> A silent court of justice in his breast,
> Himself the judge and jury,
> And himself the prisoner at the bar."

The Bible says, that "Fools make a mock of sin." Mr. Ingersoll calls a conviction of sin, "a night-mare — the result of too much appetite and too little digestion." It is not possible to conceive of a more unmitigated absurdity. Surely it was something more real than night-mare which David felt when he thought of his double crime of adultery and murder, and cried, "Against thee, thee only I have sinned, and done this evil in thy sight." Surely it was something more serious than night-mare which made Judas throw down the price of his infamy in the temple, and exclaim, "I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood." Surely it was more than a nightmare that inspired the prayer of the dying thief: "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." Surely it was something more serious than melancholy, born of indigestion, that afflicted a more honest infidel than Ingersoll, when he cried, "My principles have poisoned my friends, my extravagance has beggared my child, and my unkindness has murdered my wife! Oh, God is there yet another hell? But hell itself will be a refuge if it only hide me from thy face."

Among the many abominably false isms to which even some people who call themselves Christians have committed themselves, is one which declares that "Evil is a blessing to mankind—a means selected from the infinite resources for

Our Development

—a ladder whereby we climb to moral heights yet unattained." Whether you call this Pantheism, or Hegelianism, or Universalism, or Monism, or Christian Science, it is a plain and unmistakable denial of the Word of God. That word forbids us in the most positive and intelligible terms to call evil, good. It teaches us not that sin elevates, but that it degrades; not that it leads to happiness, but to misery.

The doctrine of the Bible on this subject is supported by the every-day observations and experiences of men, and by the common sense of the world. No philosophy in the universe can convince the average man that a participation in the vices, debaucheries and deviltries of barrooms and gambling dens, is included in the divine plan by which men are to be disciplined into virtue and developed into the likeness of God. To the end of time the common-sense of the world will support the Bible in saying that, "he that walketh with wise men shall be wise, but the companion of fools shall be destroyed."

Man is a complete and distinct entity. He is not a part of the Divine Being. What he does is not God's act. He knows good from evil. He has the power to love one and hate the other, and to choose one and reject the other. In the exercise of this power he makes his glory or his shame, his happiness or his wrechedness, his meetness for heaven, or his fitness for hell. Sin then is the will of the individual man asserting itself against the will of God. It is the deliberate and wilful rebellion of creature against the Creator. In the final analysis it is selfishness pure and simple. It is a man's defiant assertion of his purpose to be lord and monarch of himself. It is his absolute repudiation of any higher law than his own will. It is self-damnation—a man's own choice of "everlasting destruction from the presence of God, and from the glory of his power."

Here then the world is confronted with the most fearful of all realities—sin—God's enemy, and man's destroyer. That reality makes the greatest problem with which human thought has ever grappled. Here is a disease that has laid its destroying hand upon every fibre of man's moral being. How can it be cured? Here are immortal spirits bound with infernal fetters. How can these shackles be removed? Here is loathsomeness worse than the rottenness the grave. How can it be cleansed?

How can we get rid of sin? That man's supreme question. The history the world shows that there never has be a time when men did not believe that so remedy for sin had been provided. A expressed this belief when he kindled first altar fire and made an offering u the Lord. Noah expressed it in the sa fice which he made on leaving the A Abraham believed it and taught it to children. Moses expressed it in the in tution of the symbols and ceremonies the Tabernacle; and the prophets of Is proclaimed it with almost seraphic z The whole Pagan world has ever cherish the belief that there has been provided s remedy for sin. It has always had its tars and sacrifices; and not knowing true and living God it has made its ap to gods of its own creation.

Let us thank God that there is a cure sin. "There is a balm in Gilead, an Physician there." "There is an eye pity, and an arm to save." The ange the Lord announced that remedy whe said to Joseph, concerning the child which Mary should give birth, "His n shall be called Jesus; for he shall save people from their sins." A great multi of the heavenly host proclaimed it w they hovered over the birthplace of Divine Child, and sang, "Glory to Go the highest; Peace on earth, and tow men, good will."

"He shall save his people." The poi which I would give special emphasis closing, is, that

The Saviour of Men

Salvation is in him, and not in thing he every said, nor in anything he commanded others to say. The trines of the Bible are only finger-bo that point us to Christ. ZENANA WORK IN INDIA.

An American Missionary Tells of her Visits to Hindoo Homes.

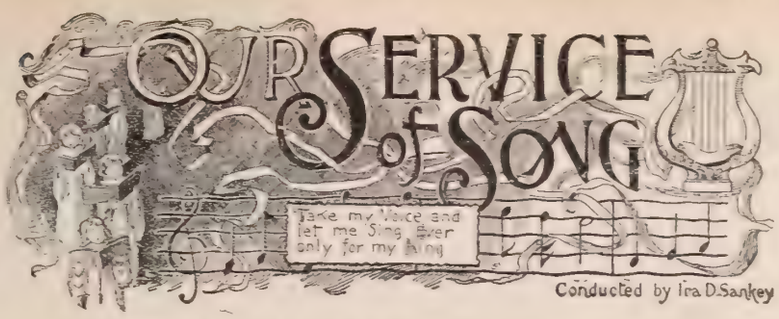
MISS Eda Rodenisk, in "The Missionary Link," gives a most interesting picture of Zenana work at Allahabad, India. She says: When one considers our mission work in its different departments of labor, Sunday and week-day schools, zenana teaching, tract distribution, and the many others brought under the influence of the Gospel story, we may well thank God and take courage. The schools are centres of blessing to the neighborhood. In visiting the zenanas, you enter a court-yard with kitchen, store-room, and sitting-room opening into it, the latter mostly occupied by the men of the family. In the middle of the yard stands a large tub of water, used for ablutions and domestic purposes, and standing near by are large brass water jugs, glistening in the sunshine. A parrot in an iron cage calls out in harsh, discordant tones, and one is very thankful to escape from the noisy hall, as the pupil with a most cordial welcome leads the way upstairs. We become very much attached to our pupils, especially those whom we have instructed for many years, as they take so much pains to prepare their lessons properly. We are more than teachers or pupil, we are intimate friends, and many are interested in the Scriptures. The Lord has many in the zenanas as yet in the childhood of faith.

How many varied lives zenana work touches! Here is a woman whose lot is cast in circumstances of comfort, happy in her husband's love, proud of her position, and her sons, passing successful examinations, shortly to bring home brides with large dowries. Yet her heart feels that her dear earthly treasures will pass away from her, and she be left alone and bereft of all joy. The Word of God has read shines between the shadows that threaten to fall upon her, and she sees Jesus standing in the midst of all her fleeting joys, calling her to find a abiding place in his changeless love, and to lay up for herself imperishable treasure in heaven. Another pupil is less happily situated: a worthless husband, ungrateful, unloving sons, who get angry and rude because she cannot furnish them with pice for gambling. A weary-hearted woman burdened with care and anxiety, sick and with none to care whether she lives or dies, so that she cooks the meals and stands by ready to serve. Yet she finds a little time while her husband is away at work to sit with her teacher, to whom has told her of one named Jesus, "who is touched with the feeling of our infirmities." Poor woman! dulled by her griefs and sorrows, like rain on the parched ground is the news to her that One loves and cares for her. She makes but little progress in reading, and rarely looks, but the charm about her is that her regularity and attentiveness are more than you expected. She does not say much to her husband of the teacher's visits, lest in one of his ugly tempers he should forbid her learning, just to deprive her of a pleasure. There are whispered prayers which go up from a heart into which a little light, hope, and comfort are stealing: she has heard of a home where all is peace and love, and the way to it is Jesus.

A KAFIR PHYSICIAN.

In the Medical Missionary Training Institute of Agra, India, there is a young man studying for medical work who has an interesting history. He comes from Afirstana, country, lying between the Northwest frontier of India and the Hindu Mountains. The Kafirs believe in one Supreme Being, whom they call Imbra, as well a number of evil spirits. Sacred stones are set up to these in their temples, but little attention is paid to them either by the priests or the people. The young student's name is Nazzarullah. His father was a tribal chief among the Kafirs. He was evidently a man of considerable force of character, one who had made his influence felt beyond the borders. The Mohammedans beyond the frontier had a special grudge against him, and they made a raid upon his tribe, and carried off Nazzurullah to a mountain village beyond the frontier. Several years afterwards Syed Shah, a native Christian, was "on a journey of evangelic exploration," and arrived at the village. Learning his history, Syed Shah became doubly interested in Nazzurullah, and succeded in carrying him off to Peshawur, and lodged him in the Mission.

He was afterward sent to the excellent boys' school connected with the Church Missionary Society, at Batula. He soon showed great apititude in his studies. In 1891 Dr. A. Neve visited Batula, and took a fancy to Nazzurullan, and, with the consent of the teachers, took him back with him to Kashmir, and employed him as a compounder in the Mission Dispensary, from whence he was sent to the Agra Institute. He is now almost twenty years of age, and a quiet, good-tempered lad. He has given several Gospel addresses since he has been in the Institute.



LET ME DIE LIKE A CHRISTIAN.

APOCALYPTIC FIGURES.

The Imagery of the Book of Revelation Typical of Events in Earth and Sky at the Close of the Dispensation.

BY WILLIAM MAUDE.

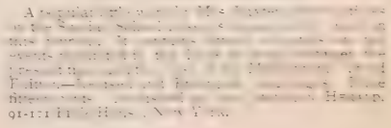
IT is a very remarkable circumstance, however, that whereas in the fourth chapter of Revelation, there is no allusion to the Jewish tabernacle or its furniture, yet, in the sixth chapter, on the opening of the fifth seal, the seer tells us, "I saw underneath the altar the souls of them that had been slain for the word of God," &c., and this altar is apparently the altar of sacrifice—corresponding to the brazen altar of the tabernacle—for Alford says, "the peculiar form of the word slain, which follows, seems to imply this." Yet, again, in the eighth chapter, on the opening of the seventh seal, we read: "And another angel came and stood over the altar, having a golden censer, and there was given unto him much incense, that he should add it unto the prayers of all the saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne. Here, then, we have reference made to the golden altar, which, in the tabernacle, occupied its position in the holy place, and which is here located "before the throne." A similar allusion to "the golden altar" is made in the ninth chapter, on the sounding of the sixth trumpet; and then, in the eleventh chapter, on the sounding of the seventh trumpet, we meet with the more explicit and comprehensive statement: "And there was opened the temple of God that is in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his covenant." While, lastly, in the fifteenth chapter, before the pouring out of the seven vials, John says: "And I saw, and the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened: and there came out of the temple the seven angels that had the seven last plagues, arrayed with precious stones, pure and bright, and girt about their breasts with golden girdles. And one of the four living creatures gave unto the seven angels seven golden bowls full of the wrath of God." And here observe particularly that, though the scene would seem to be the temple, "the living creatures"—and as we learn from chapter 19: 4, the elders and the throne itself—are still simultaneously present. Thus we have mention made—first, of the altar of sacrifice, which, in the tabernacle, stood in the outer court—then of the golden altar, which had its position in the holy place; and, lastly, of the Holy of Holies, with the ark of the covenant within it. And all this, in combination with the scenery of the heavenly vision in the fourth chapter, which remains permanent throughout. How is this to be reconciled? Is the explanation this—which, if true, is surely very beautiful?—that, as the visions of the Divine Judgment proceeded, the scenery of the temple—God's earthly dwelling place—grew up, as in a grand transformation scene around the unearthly, heavenly glories described in the fourth chapter; till, subsequently, the judgments being ended, and their blessed result attained, the "great voice out of the throne" shall be heard, saying: "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he shall dwell among them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God."

THE LORD'S COMING.



CHRIST AND THE CHURCH.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing July 14. Matt. 16: 13-20.

WHAT the motto of the Society means to it as a whole, and to each individual member of it, is an appropriate Topic for the week preceding the assembling of the mighty host in annual convention. "For Christ and the Church" are the words inscribed on its banners, and they should be inscribed on every heart. At a time like this, we may wisely pause and ask ourselves what they mean. It is significant that in this nineteenth century there should be such a motto. The personal tie which held a few men around a young Jewish Teacher many centuries ago, had apparently nothing of permanence in it. When he and they passed away, it would be natural that all trace of them should disappear. Yet with every succeeding generation the church reappears and the same process of individual calling takes place. Men come out from the world singly and unite with some branch of the great body; and ever, as one generation passes away, a larger number come to fill the vacant places. And each new accretion has the same source and fount of life. The personal power and vitality of Christ in every new generation reaches out and holds and supports the new members. Men are not born into the church; they come voluntarily by an active choice, and each finds in it the power and vigor that their fathers found in previous generations. So the church, in its life to-day, stands as a testimony to the inexhaustible, life-giving energy of Christ. Its strength consists in the personal union of each individual member to him. The union of each to each has no power but in this. With this view of the church, we get from our motto the one central and fundamental principle of loyalty. The church becomes the symbol of the invisible union with Christ. Apart from him it would be a mere collection of atoms without coherence. From that principle springs the next principle of tolerance. The church is many-sided, separated, partitioned off and of many kinds of development, but it is one in essence. My brother sees the beauty of one aspect of it, finds that the needs of his nature are met by one application of its principles, while I find my strength and comfort in quite another form of development. With all our differences, the product of peculiarities of mental constitution, education and association, we are in union in the one essential of loyalty to Christ. That union dwarfs all differences, and from different points of the compass the roads converge to the great Centre. The radii may be far apart at their extremities, but at the Centre they are near together. But in its aggressive implication the motto has its chief force. The single calling of individuals must go on until the church is lost in the Kingdom. It is for this that the motto stands. The call mus be given widely. Each man living for Christ can utter it in his own circle, and those who will, may carry it into other lands. For Christ and the church we may deny ourselves, may sacrifice rest and pleasure, home and kindred, the world and life itself, and count all well lost in the glorious service.

KING'S DAUGHTERS ABROAD.

From almost every country on earth, where Christianity has been planted, come reports of noble work done by the Order of King's Daughters. On the European continent, as in England, the silver cross and its meaning are well known, and in Japan and China the the Order has taken root. A very active circle has been organized in Dresden, where a number of American girls are staying. The circle frequently changes its membership as the visitors leave and new ones come, but the work never ceases. Its motto is the significant "Ich Dien" ("I serve"), which so well indicates the mission of the Order. The members are subdivided as to theire particular departments of work, into four committees. One attends to the music of the American Church; a second has charge of the books, decorations, etc.; a third visits any families who may be in sickness or trouble and the fourth has charge of the Sunday School and all work among children. On this page is a portrait, of Miss Neva Vail the leader of the Circle for which, with its campanion portrait of Miss Lottie Moorhouse, we are indebted to the courtesy of "The Silver Cross."

Miss Moorhouse is the leader of the Violet Circle in the French capital. Followers of Christ find abundant opportunities for service in Paris, both among the poor and the rich and the American girls there who love that service have found that they can do more effective work in the organization of King's Daughters. Many of them are art students and they have turned their talents to account for the benefit of the poor. A meeting is held every week, at which there are painting, sewing and other occupations. The articles made are taken to the hospitals and orphanages or are retained for the annual fair, the proceeds of which are devoted to charity. There is a home for crippled children in Paris, in which the Violet Circle is deeply interested. It has been beautified, almost beyond recognition, by gaily painted screens, wooden panels, etc., and there is a perfect treasury of scrapbooks, in which the little sufferers find endless delight. All these are the products of the deft fingers and bright minds of the members of the Circle, and they report themselves as amply rewarded by the gratitude of the little ones and the satisfaction of rendering service In His Name.

THE ENGLISH NATIONAL C. E. CONVENTION.

A most successful Convention of the Christian Endeavor Societies of Great Britain was held June 1 to 4. Birmingham was chosen as the meeting place not only on account of its central position, but because Christian Endeavor has attained in that city its most extensive acceptance. The local union comprises nearly seventy societies, with over 3,600 active members About two thousand delegates from all parts of the Kingdom attended the Convention, and were freely entertained by the Birmingham members for the four days. The report showed that the number of societies had increased from 1453 last year to 2445 this year, and the membership to 77,917 active, 32,237 associate and 10,879 honorary. The societies are divided among the denominations thus:—Baptist, 791; Congregational, 733; Presbyterian, 182; Epicopal, 5; Weslevan, 65; Primitive Methodist, 124; Bible Christians, 41; United Methodist Free Church, 175; Methodist New Connexion, 132. The benefit of the Society to the churches was indicated by the record, that of the additions to the churches during the year, 6784 came from Christian Endeavor Societies, and 5789 associate members became active. In Ireland there are from sixty to seventy societies with about three thousand members. The Convention was characterized throughout by the utmost enthusiasm. Pastors of all denominations testified to the help derived from the Society, and heartily recommended it to their brother ministers. The prospect for a large increase in the number of societies during the ensuing year is most encouraging. It was decided to hold the Convention at Bristol next year.

Among the Baptist Endeavorers who will speak at Boston are Rev. Drs. Wayland Hoyt, J. T. Beckley, W. C. Bitting, A. W. H. Hodder, George E. Herr, Henry C. Mabie and A. C. Dixon. The theme of the last named speaker is "Denominational loyalty and Interdenominational fellowship."

Ninety-two societies and over three thousand members are now enrolled in the Junior Christian Endeavor Local Union of New York City, and new societies are reported at every meeting of the Superintendents. The president has appointed a committee to make arrangements for Juniors who expect to attend the International Convention at Boston. This committee reports that at least six, and possibly several other Junior Societies will be represented there by some of their members.

July Days at Mont-Lawn.

Parties of Happy Little Folks Daily arriving — The Ordeal of "Passing the Doctor" before the Start — How Saturday is Spent at Our Children's Home

EACH passing day brings many new additions to the number of the little guests, who are quartered at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, at Mont-Lawn on the Hudson. Just before embarkation on the steamer "Chrystenah" for the sail to the Home, the youthful guests have to undergo the ordeal of "passing the doctor." While waiting their turn for this examination—which occupies only a moment or two in each case—the children are very quiet and well behaved; yet their intense faces show how much they will the ordeal were well over. One artist's camera has very happily caught a group of the young folks while waiting for the doctor. Those who pass, march triumphantly with chatter and laughter to the street car that takes them to the steamer dock, while the few rejected ones are solaced with the kindest words and the prospect of better fortune next time.

At the Home, all worldly cares are forgotten. In the morning, mingling with the merry notes of the robin, and the fragrant freshness of wood and meadow, comes the sound of children's voices. Here and there, dotting the lawn in front of the Home, are gathered little groups, talking earnestly and gaily of plans for the day. The number on the lawn is continually augmented by others who begin to use the "scups," or run happy races over the grass. The faces of all are bright and clean.

Saturday last was a typical day. Promptly as the gong sounded its summons, from all sides came the scampering of many feet toward the place, near the flag, where the line of march was to be formed. Each missionary stood near the children under her care; the line was soon ready. At the head walked the drummer, who handled the sticks right well. At a signal from the missionary in charge, the clear, childish voices broke forth in the stirring lines, "Glory, Glory, Hallelujah!" and then they marched down to the dining-room for a tempting breakfast of rolled oats and cream, together with as many slices of bread and butter, and cups of milk as anyone desired. Still singing and marching the children went to their places and when all were seated there was a moment of expectant silence. The missionary in charge touched her bell, paused an instant, and then led the children as they sang the thankful grace of P. P. Bliss:

God is great and God is good,
And we thank him for this food,
By his hand must all be fed.
Give us, Lord, our daily bread.

When the probable home-training,—or perhaps, more truthfully, the lack of it—and environments of these children are considered, it becomes a matter of some surprise that they are so tractable and well-behaved. After breakfast comes play time on the lawn, with its glad shouts and happy laughter. In one corner, sheltered somewhat by the sturdy, dark-green spruce trees, is the croquet ground, where the hours pass in many a mirthful if not skilful, game. At half after ten, the gong again sounds, and there is a repetition of the scurrying, hurrying feet, for the children are anxious for the recreation hour.

Entering the chapel they quietly take their seats, and wait expectantly for their "hour." Knowing the familiarity of the children with the songs of the day, and their delight in singing to the echo, those in charge have arranged this hour, when almost the entire entertainment is furnished by the children. Perhaps "America" is the first song—for it is sung once or twice every day—and it is an inspiration to hear the blending of the voices of the descendants of many races in the stirring words:

My country, 'tis of thee;
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing!

Then some child offers or is selected to sing, "I won't play in your yard," while all unite in the chorus. This is done with a will and spirit that would surprise, as well as please. To the question, "who can recite?" several hands are raised, and several suitable pieces are spoken to the children by those of their number who have been taught in school: temperance and Christmas are in close relationship, while a short piece learned for Childrens' Day service is followed by the old, well-beloved "Twinkle, twinkle, little star!" which, like all others, is heartily applauded. However, it is in singing that the greatest pleasure lies, for in that all participate. "Sweet Marie" and "Suwanee River" are equal favorites, while the honors are about equally divided between "The Sidewalks of New York," and "Two Little Girls in Blue."

This recreation hour is limited to the length of the manifested interest of the children. Then the return march is made, where, under the direction of the missionary, fun and games complete the morning. Each day several missionaries are chosen to be in especial charge of the lawn, or services, either in the morning or afternoon. To witness the pure enjoyment of the children, their healthful rompings, their hearty, full-voiced praises, sung and spoken, and to observe the real improvement a child undergoes owing to its ten days' visit, would amply compensate all the kind-hearted patrons of the Childrens' Home for their gifts in its behalf. Money could not be spent in a better cause than in giving to these pale-faced little ones the bright eyes and glowing cheeks of health and happiness, even for a few brief summer hours. Already a number of readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, having learned from a recent issue that it only costs three dollars to maintain a child ten days at the Home—all traveling and other expenses included—have written us forwarding their voluntary contributions for that purpose. Some benevolently disposed friends generously provide for three or four, and others for half a dozen little guests. Not all can do this; but we cordially invite our friends everywhere to do what they can towards giving these forlorn little mites of humanity an outing. If you cannot give $5 you may be able to give $3, which will make at least one child sufficiently happy to remember your goodness all the rest of the year. But even the smallest offering you send will be welcome, and will be the means of doing much good, especially during the torrid months of July and August. It is a Christ-like act to take one of these miserable, puny slum-children out of the dirt and wretchedness and vice of its surroundings, and transplant it to an atmosphere that is sweet and healthful, where its limbs may be strengthened; where, instead of vile oaths and ribald language, it may listen to words that will refresh the young spirit, and fill it with a strange love and gentleness. Body and soul both helped, and one fragile soul, at least, made brighter and happier by the gift.

Every dollar and every dime contributed by our friends for this humane purpose will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. On another page of this issue will be found the acknowledgments of contributions received during the past week.

The Little Word, "Doing."

"Never shall I forget," writes Margaret Bottome, "a time of mental perplexity and of doubt when I said, 'It certainly is right to be kind, so I will be kind to those around me.' I did not know I had, by just doing what I did, at least struck the road which would lead me out of my troubles. Oh, that little word doing is a wonderful word. 'If any man will do his will he should know.' It does not say if any man will think, though it is right to think, if any many will argue, if any man will read, but if any man will do. Action alone will take you out of great mental trouble—that and being thankful for something or for somebody."

KEEP TRYING.

IF boys should get discouraged
At lessons or at work,
And say, "There's no use trying,"
And all hard tasks should shirk,
And keep on shirking, shirking,
Till the boy becomes a man,
I wonder what the world will do
To carry out its plan?

The coward in the conflict
Gives up at first defeat;
If once repulsed, his courage
Lies shattered at his feet.
The brave heart wins the battle
Because through thick and thin,
He'll not give up as conquered;
He fights, and fights to win.

THE CHILDREN AND THE BIRDS.

WE are gratified to observe that the plea of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for mercy for our feathered songsters, is attracting the liveliest attention in many parts of the Union. Different publications have warmly endorsed the plea, and supplemented it with a sturdy condemnation of those who are engaged in massacring the song-birds, whether out of a sheer love of slaughter, or to supply the demands of a preposterous and wicked fashion.

In a recent article, Isabella C. Barrows has this to say on the subject: "One has but to go through the markets of any city, especially in the South, to see scores and hundreds of song-birds exposed for sale. New England people watch for the blue birds, and herald their arrival in the newspapers, rejoicing at the advent of summer which they prophecy. But the heralds who last year essayed their first flight among the branches of the apple tree, will not all come back this year. An ornithologist walking through the market in Washington, paused to count three hundred blue birds in one stall. The feathers had been stripped off to hide the iniquity from the general public, but the trained eye of the naturalist was not deceived. Such was the welcome they had for these songsters on their northward way! Myriads of song-birds of many species lose their lives every year to gratify the appetite of man. Robins are considered legitimate table birds in some parts of the country, an expert sometimes bagging three thousand in a day. Even the oriole and song sparrow share the same fate, and the bobolink is shot by the thousand wherever the merry little fellow is found. Even the tiny wren is killed for food in some places.

"A few years ago, in the blossoming season, the orchards of the land were filled with myriads of tiny warblers and other migratory birds, so small that they were hardly noticed among the flowers. With their busy little bills they killed countless injurious insects, and their coming was a blessing to the horticulturist. Their disappearance has been followed by fruit diseases of every kind. The same is true of the grain fields."

We wish it were possible to inspire every preacher, teacher, editor, and parent in this land to a bird-protective crusade. Even the sparrows are not beneath our Father's kindly care, and surely his children, who profess to be followers of the gentle Saviour, should endeavor to shield the innocent little tenants of the air, the woods, and the fields, from the ruthless hand of the slayer.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Planning a Decoration.

NOTHING could have surprised Alice more than the announcement Mr. Jacobs made. She and her mother and the two young men formed an attentive audience as the old man explained his plans in detail. Conscience had evidently been working powerfully upon him. The lamentable condition of his tenants and their neighbors had made his heart heavy, but, like many others, who have grieved to see the miseries of the poor, he had seen no way to remedy them. The improvement visible since Alice had lived in the district, had impressed him. Evidently this wretchedness was not beyond remedy. So much was proved and the Jew had been prompted by what he had seen to do something on his own account. He had gone to work with remarkable intelligence, and with a sympathy for the poor that few suspected him of possessing.

"It vos a meeting-place that you vant, Miss Alice," he said. "The mens at night, the childrens afternoons and holidays, and the womens when they can. A large room Miss Alice vants, and small rooms to have her poor friends altogether. Music, lecture, tea-party, oder thing vot you call gindergartens, vot you will, you there can do. That you can arrange; the room I vill provide. It is a large room everything convenient and all ready. It was a store I was building shoost around the corner. I plan to have flats above and rent em oudt to families; but I change my plan. All above store is for Miss Alice and her friends, free for nothing. That is mein contribution. It is all painted and finished lovely."

Alice jumped to her feet and, as once before in the terrible crisis of her trouble, she astonished the good old man by taking his face between her two hands and imprinting a kiss on his forehead. "You dear, good, thoughtful friend," she said, "however did you think of that? Why, it is the very thing we need. I expected to go around and get subscriptions to hire some place and here you have built us a brand-new hall. Somebody ought to expose you Mr. Jacobs. Nobody knows how good you are."

"Well, you are pleased; that is enough. I don't want exposing. I am Miss Alice's friend, nothing more. When people ask who provides this nice place, then you say, 'a friend of mein.' Now to-morrow, or some day soon, you come to me and I go with you and we see the place all over. Then you say, 'I would like this done,' or, 'I would like that done,' and I send for painter, carpenter, mason, and I have it done shoost as you say. Then you have your teachers, and preachers, and good peoples come and invite all your poor friends and have tea, and tell them all about it. You say, 'this is your place and no one else has a right here. This is for you to come to and have a good time, singing, playing with childrens vat you will.' It will be dedicated so."

"Good! good! good!" cried Alice, clapping her hands and dancing around the room, "Just what I have been thinking about; I wanted to give a dinner to the poor people before I left, and an entertainment for our Band of Hope. We had no place to meet and I could only have six or seven together at a time, and we'll have a W. C. T. U."

"Vell, Miss, de hall is free for everything dot is goot for ever."

"And Mamma, we'll have a kinder garten, and keep it up, and the boys shall pay [illegible]"

"We," said Fred in mock astonishment. [illegible] my part, and Fred will make the speeches and write a dedication poem and recite it for his part."

"Mr. Jacobs," said Alice, "you are a public benefactor, and your hall will do much good. You have been so kind to me that I am going to call you 'Uncle Jacobs' as long as I live."

"Vell, my tear young frient, I would be a leetle careful about dot," said the Jew with a twinkle in his eye, "a good many young shentlemen call me dot now."

Fred and Will burst into laughter, and Alice looked rather surprised.

"You see, Miss Alice, you vas too innocent to onderstand de slang of my business. Ven a young shentleman has spent all his money and in de morning finds dot he has no money to get his breakfast, he says, 'I vill hang up my ulster at my uncle's,' or ven anoder has been on vat ve call a spree, and his frient say, 'vat time is it already?' he say, 'I don't know, my watch is at my uncle's.'"

"Oh, I think I see now," said Alice smiling, "but you shall be my dear old uncle, anyway."

"And I shall be so proud as if I make a tousant dollars," said Mr. Jacobs, rising to go. "Ven can you come and see de hall and tell me how you like him, and anyting you like to have done?"

"I am so anxious to see it that I will come at any time," said Alice. "To-morrow afternoon, if that time suits you."

"I will be dere all afternoon."

"Then we will come at two," said Alice. "I vas glat to hear dat your property vas so much saved. Mr. Mapleton, how long you tink you stay mit us here?"

"Yes," said Will, "we were indeed lucky in being able to recover so much of our property; as to when we shall move depends on circumstances. I would be willing to stay here for my life, as I never was so happy in any other house."

"Vel, dat please me, but of course it cannot be."

"Contentment and cheerfulness," said Mrs. Mapleton, "are what make home; they will make a cottage better than a palace, while discontent and sorrow will make the palace a prison. I remember how small and shabby these rooms appeared to me when I first lived in them, but now they are so bright and cheerful that I really believe I shall be sorry when I leave them."

"Vell, I have spent such a happy evening dat I don't want to go neider, but I must;" and after many hand-shakes and hearty "good-nights," Alice lighted the old man down the stairs.

CHAPTER XXXII.

The New Hall.

The next afternoon Mrs. Mapleton, Alice and Fred went over to see the new hall, and a very pretty room they found it to be. It was finished—wall and ceiling—in hard pine, with light cane seat chairs to match. It had ante rooms and a small room already fitted with shelves for a library.

The main hall would seat from two hundred and fifty to three hundred persons. Nothing had ben forgotten. There were desks for the secretary and treasurer; the stand for the presidig officer, with gavel and water bottle and glass all ready.

Alice clapped her hands with delight as soon as she entered. "This is delightful," she said. "It is a beautiful hall and furnished already for a society to meet."

"Yes," said Mr. Jacobs, "I vent down mid Callaghan to some Sons of Temperance Hall, vere he go to dem meeting, and I see how it vas fixed up, and say, 'dot vill do,' so I have it done dot vay."

"You have shown wonderful taste as well as generosity," said Mrs. Mapleton, "and it is to be free I understand,"

"Vell, yes, to our own peoples and dere friends, but I don't know about vat you call dem generosities; I tink I make some money out of it already."

"How do you propose doing that?" asked Fred.

"Vell, if I can get de mens to come here and not go mid de saloon, den dey have some money already, and I get my rents, and de womans come here and have a goot time, and not spend so much for beer, den dey come and get dere tings and pay me my interest, and buys some more tings; den by and bye dem saloons clear out and better peoples come here to live and de value of my property go up."

"Well," said Fred, "you certainly take a very sensible view of the case, but it is a great inovation on all the systems practised heretofore by landlords with poor and rickety tenement houses. I am afraid they will call you a crank."

"Vell, how did you guess dot so quick? Ha! ha! dot's shust vat dey vas call me already. But if dot is so it is all Miss Alice's fault. I never tink of doing such a ting till I see vat you do for dem people by you kind vays. Den I say mid myself, 'dot is all right,' and now I am glad you like him. But you must open it for me before you go way."

"That we will, with a great deal of pleasure," said Alice.

"Well you draw on me for the money and we gives those peoples a meal they don't often get. Ice cream and cakes and tea and coffee and lemonade, everyding but beer. Don't want any beers ever in this place. Beer is everywhere and it makes me sick to see it. The men and the women have it all the time and it makes em so poor and miserable and quarrelsome. Get everything else and tell the men to send the bills to Jacobs and he pays em right off."

"No, no," said Fred. "That is not the bargain. You are selfish, Mr. Jacobs, you want all the pleasure. You have given the hall; Miss Alice's brother and I must have the feed for our share. We will provide all that."

"Well, well, I don't want to be selfish any more," said Mr. Jacobs. "You pays if you want to, but I am ready if there is any need."

Alice could not rest until the arrangements were commenced; so that evening Louie was sent for, and she with Alice, Fred and Will formed themselves into a committee on entertainment. Mr. Joy was to be invited to preside, and the whole Mary Street Church were to be taken into service. Mrs. Callaghan's aid could be relied on, and the general character of the entertainment was outlined.

The children's share of the entertainment had precedence. Never had so many clean and well-dressed boys and girls been seen in that locality as gathered at the hall at 3 o'clock on the day appointed. Mrs. Callaghan was in her element as she flew from one table to another with the good things.

Never had the children partaken of such a dinner; then the ice cream, the oranges, and nuts, and raisins. Never were they known to disappear with such alarming rapidity. Alice became a little alarmed, and asked Mrs. Callaghan if there was any danger of the children injuring themselves.

"Sure, Miss, some of 'em may be sick to-night, but they will get over it. It's the first time many of 'em ever had all they could eat at onct, and the pains will help 'em to remember the good toime as long as they live."

"Have you had all you want?" Louie asked a boy who sat panting at the table.

"Yes, Miss; wish I hadn't though."

"Why do you wish that?" she asked in surprise?"

"Cause I'd like to begin over agin, Miss."

One little girl with a pinched, pale face, in a patched but clean dress, was seen to take a piece of everything offered, but did not eat. Alice noticed her great hungry-looking eyes and full plate, and spoke to her. "Why don't you eat? I hope you are not sick."

"Please, Miss, I has a little sick brudder, and I thought mebee you'd let me take mine home to him, cos he was a-crying when he couldn't come."

"Bless your dear little heart," said Alice. "Eat all you want, and you shall have a basketful to take home to your brother. Thus assured, it did not take many minutes for the little girl to make up all the lost time.

After dinner the children were entertained with music and song, and some short printed speeches. The Band of Hope was explained, and officers appointed, and ever so many new members enrolled at the close. Each child on leaving the hall received a picture card and a box of candy.

"Dat's de biggest time I ever seed," s[illegible] one boy.

If the whole party of happy children [illegible] been polled, the verdict on the entert[illegible]ment would not have differed in sentin[illegible] from the boy's epigrammatic statement [illegible] had been a very joyful time with them, [illegible] would be a red-letter day in the historie[illegible] their youth.

Louie, Alice, and Mrs. Callaghan w[illegible] sitting together in the little library res[illegible] after their exertions, when Will and F[illegible] came in.

"Well, this is an auspicious beginnin[illegible] said Fred. "I never saw children so ha[illegible] in my life before. Poor old Jacobs lo[illegible] in and was quite overcome. He said to [illegible] he didn't care if he died now, he felt so [illegible] to have done something good before [illegible] went. I wanted to bring him up to mak[illegible] speech, but he wouldn't come. He sai[illegible] had seen the children happy and Miss [illegible] enjoying herself, and that was enough

"I wish I had seen him," said Alice. "[illegible] is so modest, there is no managing hi[illegible] all. I will take care he does not escap[illegible] morrow night at the grown-up peo[illegible] meeting. He must be publicly than[illegible] whether he likes it or not, and the pe[illegible] must know who it is that is doing all [illegible] for them."

There was a knock at the door, an[illegible] was opened a few inches from the out[illegible] and Mr. Callaghan's broad face showe[illegible] the aperture. The face wore a very [illegible] broad smile, and with a meaning look, [illegible] laghan said he wad like a word with [illegible] wife.

"Sure, I don't know what the [illegible] means," said Mrs. Callaghan when [illegible] returned after a brief interview with [illegible] husband in the corridor. "He's full of [illegible] tery about something. There's a wa[illegible] outside with packing cases in it, and [illegible] laghan says they want to bring the[illegible] here. Sure, there's no room to store [illegible] thing here."

"Perhaps Mr. Jacobs thought we sh[illegible] not use this room, and is putting somet[illegible] here till we do use it," said Alice. "We[illegible] manage without it, so we will get out o[illegible] way."

By this time several heavy cases wer[illegible] the pavement, and one after another [illegible] being brought in. Mrs. Mapleton, [illegible] had been busy with the others, had [illegible] been with them in the library, and [illegible] went in search of her, fearing that [illegible] might be tired. She could not find [illegible] and was just concluding that she had [illegible] home, when passing the half-open do[illegible] the library, she caught sight of her m[illegible] within. She was very busy, and se[illegible] very happy. Alice put her head int[illegible] room to say a passing word, when a [illegible] met her gaze that arrested her. One [illegible] packing cases was opened and reveal[illegible] contents. Books of all shapes and [illegible] and styles of binding were packed in it [illegible] on the floor and shelves were piles of [illegible] volumes out of the other cases. O[illegible] floor a pretty red carpet was rolled up [illegible] to be laid down, and there was a new [illegible] ry ladder of the latest design.

"Why, mother, where did you g[illegible] all these?" Alice asked in amazement.

"Oh, Alice, that is a shame. It w[illegible] be a surprise to you all."

"Well, there is no doubt about it be[illegible] a surprise. Come here, Louie, and see [illegible] treasures mamma is handling."

"I may as well tell you the whole [illegible] now you have made your discovery," [illegible] Mrs. Mapleton. "I told Mrs. Wilson [illegible] was going forward, and she was as [illegible] interested as I. She has been much ch[illegible] since her illness, as Louie will testify. [illegible] both wanted to do something ourselv[illegible] have some of the pleasure in the new [illegible] tution, but we did not know what t[illegible] At last, Mrs. Wilson thought of the b[illegible] and then I remembered the empty sh[illegible] So we agreed to furnish the little roo[illegible] fill the shelves as our part of the worl[illegible] had some help in the selection from M[illegible] and another friend, and here is the [illegible] But we did not want anyone to see [illegible] till the shelves were filled and the [illegible] laid."

"But, mamma, you can never [illegible] many books in, and here is a bigge[illegible] than any of them not opened yet."

GARDENS.*

T wide fair gardens, the rich lush fields,
Which no man planted, and no man tills,
The strong seeds drifted, their brave bloom lifted.

HE ANSWER TO PRAYER.†

THE deepest answer to prayer is not a voice — not a "yes" or a "no;" it is the support of a hand. This is not the common view. I cry to God in the night, and strain through the silence for a message. I doubt that the answer shall be a never dream that the reply shall be but a consent or a denial. I have the removal of a trouble; I assume it will either be granted or refused. No thinks the Psalmist. His best hope prayer is neither the one nor the other. He ays that God answers his anointed not by a voice, but by a hand—not dibly, but indirectly. There comes from ne lent skies no peal of music; there ds through the outward dark no gleam ory; but into the heart there steals a ge strength, an unaccountable peace. ps it was not felt at once. You were rch of another kind of answer, and not have recognised its coming. It ed to grow up naturally, to be a bit of urself, to have nothing superhuman was not like an answer to prayer at was so woven with your ordinary Yet, it was God's own messenger, sponse to your cry of yesterday. You to God through one door, and he ered you by another; you opened at ont, and he came in at the back; you to be lifted into heaven, and he gave more power to live on earth; you crav- lody for the ear, and he sent you, in- the saving strength of his right Man, I accept the answer that given to thee. Thy cup did not pass, y angel came. Thy angel came by ick door, when thou wert weeping at ont. He came before thy tears were . The answer to thy prayer entered heart unseen. It was born in the hour row; it grew up while thy tears were : but when it was full-grown, there great calm. Let me believe that thy is mine. When I pour forth my soul ong crying and tears, let me believe ine answer is already come. I am ing too far to find it. I seek it in the ing of the cloud; I expect it in the ing of the cup; my eye is all on the and I forget the postern door. Let me- member thee — thy Gethsemane, thy ...

a new hand. I want something to keep the cup from trembling, yea, from spilling. I want power to hold it calmly, steadily. I want a hand to repress the shaking of my hand. I want none of its drops to fall idly, ineffectually. I want to receive thy cup in thy garden — in the power of thy peace. My prayers shall all be answered when I am answered like thee.

PHILOSOPHIC PITFALLS.*

AT the epoch when childhood gives place to youth, the entire being submits to a transformation; and among the faculties which assume new power, reason holds the first rank. The child is a creature of instinct more than reason. The formation of the judgment is one of the best proofs of the transition of which I speak. The youth examines, he compares, and from this work of elaboration will result new opinions; his judgment will be more vigorous and energetic, his opinions more personal, and they will bear the seal of originality. Very well. Can a man yield himself to this new power awakened within him, this reason under whose conduct he enters upon the domain of science, without danger? Is it a guide to which he may safely abandon himself? I do not fear grave thinking—an elevated and impartial examination which estimates things according to their real value, and neither disdains nor is prejudiced. But this I do fear, and especially for the young: false reason, false science. "A little philosophy," says Bacon, "destroys religion; much restores it." Now, young people know a little of every science, and they have enormous confidence in the little they know. This, indeed, is perfectly natural. They have shaken off the yoke of authority.

To reason, with them, is to give proof of independence. It is nothing wonderful if they assert this independence as they confront the beliefs which have lately dominated them. I know that in this first effervescence of reason there is a kind of intoxication and disorder. We all know that no one is more disdainful of collegians than recent graduates—petty self-esteem, which a little time will soon dissipate. No person is more likely to treat the beliefs of his childhood with disdain than he who has just planted his foot on the domain of science, and for whom his bachelor's diploma is his charter of emancipation. A man knows a little of astronomy, and so he ridicules the Old Testament for not putting the sun in the centre of our planetary system. He knows a little of geology, so he smiles as he reads the first chapter of Genesis. He knows a little of anthropology, so he pities the man who believes that creation can have sprung from a single head. He is a little of a critic, and he is amused with the discrepancies of the Gospels; he knows a little of medicine, so he wonders how one can believe in books which speak of demoniacs and miraculous cures; a little of philosophy, so he balances the argument for and against the existence of God.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYER.

At the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on June 23, in accordance with the requests of the following persons, who also ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Restoration of Health: "A Troubled Daughter," Philadelphia, that God would stay the progress of disease in a beloved mother on whose care her family are dependent.——"Reader," Indiana, that the journey of a suffering mother may have the desired result in the restoration of her health.——"Reader," Redding, Conn., for strength to go through a trying ordeal, and grace to devote her future life to God's service.——Reader, Iola, Wis., for the recovery of a sick woman whose husband has left town.

For the Conversion of Relatives or Friends: "In Christian Faith," North Chester, Vt. For the conversion of a young man exposed to temptation, also for his parents who are not Christians and for a brother and sister who away from home are neglecting church.——A mother, Salisbury, Md., for a dear son, the only one of his family out of the fold.——"An Anxious Wife."——For a man and his wife who are not saved.——Mrs. A. M. Wilson, Corsicana, Tex., for several friends.——F. M., Nebraska, for a brother and three friends, all of whom are backsliders.——"Mamie." Paterson, N. J., on behalf of her husband who is becoming confirmed in his subjection to the liquor habit, that he may be saved from it and become a true Christian.——"Lady," Chattanooga, Tenn., for the conversion of a talented young man who is drifting into infidelity.——Old Subscriber, Spencerport, for the conversion of a beloved boy who has formed bad habits.——"Johnny."——"For two friends that they be saved and be able to help each other."——"Grandmother," Tacoma, Wash. For a grandson who made a profession of religion, but is now living in sin.——"Subscriber," Waterboro, Me. For some one who has stolen a treasured Bible, that God would mercifully bring him or her to repentance and salvation; also for the conversion of a young man who is very sick.——Old Subscriber, Allegheny Co., Pa. For a dear friend who is drifting away from Christ, that his eyes may be opened to the love of God, and no longer misunderstand the earnest efforts of Christian friends for his good.——"One who has Faith," Wytheville, Va., for a man and his two sons who are backsliders from God, that they may all be restored.——S. J. B., for a man who declares himself unable to believe the fundamental doctrines of Christianity.——"Widow," Hill City, Tenn., for her son, once a Christian, but now a worldling, that God would draw him away from his sins and forgive him.——J. W. G., Cambridge, Mass., for the conversion of two very dear friends.——E. K. S., Dallas, Tex, for an infidel lecturer who has pledged himself to publicly declare himself a believer, if God answers the prayers of faithful women who are praying for his enlightenment.

For Special Blessings. S. E. D. Gardiner, N. Y., whose duty to her parents prevents her following the dictates of her judgment and inclination, that in some way misunderstanding may be cleared away and the path of duty made plain.——I. H. A., Baltimore, Md., for the conversion of self and family and the reclamation of a neighbor.——"In His Name," Wisconsin, that a deserted wife may be enabled to earn a livelihood for herself and a young child and that the erring husband may be brought to see the error of his ways.——"Persecuted One," California, that cruel and false aspersions may be stopped and that complete vindication of character may come and the truth be made known.——Earnest Reader, California, for stronger faith in God and in his love to those who seek him.——E. H., Beaver Falls, Pa., for restoration to God's favor, and for assurance of peace.——M. A. P., Brooklyn, whose request for prayer was presented recently, that the good work now commenced in answer to prayer may soon be perfected.——J. W., St. Louis, Mo., for God's blessing on a new enterprise.——Sorrowing Sister, Green Tree, Pa., that the financial trial now impending over a beloved brother may be averted, and he may be saved from losing his home and position in society.

Indigestion

Yields readily to Hood's Sarsaparilla, because it tones and strengthens the stomach and aids digestion by supplying pure blood. "I had indigestion so badly that I was all run down and could hardly walk. Had no appetite and could not sleep. I began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, and before I had taken a fourth of a bottle I was very much better. I also used Hood's Pills and found them splendid, very mild, yet effective. I cannot say enough in praise for what they have done for me. Since using two bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla and Hood's Pills occasionally I feel almost like a new person. I have a splendid appetite, sleep well and can work with ease." ANNIE C. LANTZ, Belleville, Pennsylvania.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

TO AID THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

DURING the week a number of kind friends among our readers have forwarded contributions in aid of the work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, which we acknowledge below. Some of the letters accompanying the gifts are so cordial and hearty that we cannot forbear making a few extracts:

CLEVELAND, O., July 11, 1895.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: Husband and I, having formerly lived in New York for many years, greatly appreciate the work you are doing among the poor little unfortunates and outcasts of the big city. Dear, wee souls! How I should love to help among them and to bring a gleam of sunshine into their lives, and tell them the story of Jesus' love for the children. As I cannot be with you in person, I send enclosed money order for $5, which would at least give two little ones a ten days' holiday. God bless your noble efforts. Our prayers are with you and the little guests at Mont-Lawn. MRS. A. J. RANSOM.

DETROIT, Mich., June 15, 1895.

DEAR SIR:—We are nine children—two brothers and a sister—whose papa has been reading to us all about the children you have up at the Home. We want to send one little boy up, and dear Mr., we send $3 of our own money. $1.50 from me, ninety cents from Janie, and sixty cents from Eddie. He's a little fellow and he's been saving for Fourth of July, so he gave half what he has in his pyramid bank.

GILBERT S. SMITH.

NEWARK, N. J., June 18, 1896.

I send $1 for the Children's Home. Wish it were more. Oh! how I envy you in the blessed work you are doing among the stray lambs, feeding them, folding them, and teaching them. M. M. (A Widow.)

C. J. B., Albany, N. Y. ($3), writes: "Send one little boy to the Home for ten days on my account. If you will send me his name, I may be able to forward a small package to him to your care." Miss Eliza Griffin, Philadelphia, (75c). "It's only a mite, but it means two and a half days for some wee woman at Mont-Lawn. Some kind heart will give the rest." John P. ——, Brooklyn, N. Y. ($1). "I have four little ones of my own and when I see them at their prayers at night, I often think of the little tenement children, all in white, kneeling by their cots at Mont-Lawn, and to the extent of my poor ability, I want to help you in your work." A Brooklyn lady (A. D. McI.), forwards check for $30.00 with the simple wish: "That it may be made the means of gladdening ten little ones and possibly of sowing the seeds of righteousness in at least one dear heart—who knows? I send it with this prayer."

FARMER BOY'S WORK FOR CHRIST.

In the early part of this century, a young lad lived on a farm near Tubingen, Germany. As he grew up he received a good education. His special delight was the study of geography, and often he wished he might be a captain of a ship and visit foreign lands. One day, in school, the teacher read an essay on missions, and the pupils were desired to express in writing the substance of what had been read. The boy, whose name was John Ludwig Krapf, was greatly impressed, and asked himself: "Shall I go as a missionary to the heathen?" The impression made at this time never left him, and at the age of eighteen he was a student in the Basle Institute for training missionaries. In 1837 he offered himself for mission work. He was accepted and sent to Abyssinia. Mombas was chosen. He and his wife landed there in 1844.

In 1846 Rebmann joined Krapf, and they settled on Rabbai, a Wanika village not far from the coast, as [illegible] Here they built themselves a home, but Krapf believed in advance. He could not sit down quietly at Rabbai, he must travel into the interior. After twelve years' absence, he returned to Germany to urge on the people to give more men and money for this work. He returned to Africa with reinforcements, but [illegible] His own health failing, Krapf left in 1853, and never again was able to return to his beloved work. Rabbai was the only station, and Rebman was left alone.

No more was heard of this mission for twenty years. In 1873, Sir Bartle Frere found Rebman still at Rabbai, working in loneliness, prematurely aged, and almost blind. On his return to England he notified the Church Missionary Society, and advised them to establish a freed slave settlement on the mainland near Mombas. The Church Missionary Society at once undertook this work. The seed sown by the earnest pioneers blossomed grandly after these many years of working and waiting. The freed slave settlement of Frere Town was started, and reinforcements sent to the mission station at Rabbai. In Mombas there are now a number of missionaries, and a hospital built, and medical mission work carried on. Frere Town is a Christian community of six or seven hundred.

A DARING ESCAPE.

A thrilling incident in the Micronesian Islands is reported to the American Board by Miss Hoppin, who has a girls' school at Kusaic. During her last voyage on the missionary ship "Morning Star," a stop was made at Nonouti. Miss Hoppin had on board with her a girl from Nonouti, and her father came on board and asked that his daughter might come ashore and visit her family, promising that she should not be kept, but allowed to return if Miss Hoppin would go ashore with her. This Miss Hoppin did the next day, but no sooner had the father got the girl ashore than he said she could not return. He then gave the girl some tobacco to chew, and ordered her to undress and put on the heathen fringe. All of this she stoutly refused to do, whereupon she was dragged by the hair of the head by her father, crying and sobbing, out of Miss Hoppin's presence. As Miss Hoppin could do nothing to save the girl, she was compelled to leave with a heavy heart. But the girl proved to be of good metal, and resisted all the coaxing and threats of the priest who was called in to subdue her. Biding her time, she escaped in the middle of the night, and after running five or six miles to a village where some of the schoolboys were spending the night ashore with friends, was brought off by them in a canoe to the "Star," much to our surprise and pleasure. The next day we expected trouble from the girl's father, thinking he would come aboard and demand her release, but he did not, evidently regarding her as more than his match.

THE BEAUTIFUL SHORE.

DO they see me afar from that beautiful shore,
As I live in the light of to-day?
Can they know my meandering of heart and of mind
And of all that I think, do and say?

Oh, thou lov'd and beloved on that beautiful shore!
Where are mansions unbuilded by man,
I long for a glimpse or a word from you there,
To know of His glorified plan.

'Tis there, are the loved in their robes purely white.
And there is the home of the blest,
For those who are cleansed in the blood of the Lamb
Are now in his kingdom of rest.

What then, though this world and our cares have an end.
Our toils and our sorrows be o'er,
For the lamp of God's love will enshroud us with joy.
When at home on the beautiful shore

A MISSIONARY'S FAMOUS RIDE.

In 1842, the pioneers of civilization in the far northwest were the little band of missionaries who had crossed the Rocky Mountains in 1836 to carry the knowledge of "the white man's God and the white man's Book of heaven" to the Indians of Oregon. "The work of the mission band," writes Rev. S. B. L. Penrose, in the Home Missionary, "is unsurpassed in the missionary annals of the world. The energy of Dr. Whitman and his statesmanlike breadth of view and dauntless courage inspire the student to-day with wonder and admiration. But his service as a missionary is less known than his service as a patriot. The debt of the United States to him cannot be measured. The stars in the American flag are due to him. Oregon, Washington, and Idaho are his gift to the United States. He alone was prophet enough to foresee their value, and hero enough to risk his life to save them. Daniel Webster, at the close of his life, said to a friend of his, a lawyer in New York City, that undoubtedly the saving of the Northwest was due to Dr. M. Whitman.

Whitman's famous ride across the continent has no parallel in the history of the world. Paul Revere's ride and Sheridan's ride are insignificant beside it. Four thousand miles across the continent, through the snows of a winter still memorable for its severity, he made his way from Walilatpulo Washington, on what his dearest friends regarded as a wild goose chase. Clad in furs he reached Washington, on March 3rd, 1843. Daniel Webster, then Secretary of State, heard his story, but was unmoved thereby. The plan at the time was to trade Oregon Territory to Great Britain for a cod fishery, and the story of the unknown missionary was heard with incredulity. Whitman went to President Tyler, who was more impressed. The marks of his winter's journey were proofs of the doctor's sincerity, and Tyler said to him that if the accessibility of Oregon to the United States could be demonstrated, if wagons could be taken across the Rocky Mountains, the Territory should not be ceded to Great Britain. The wagon train with Whitman led back that summer, 1843, was the first which ever crossed the continent, 200 wagons, almost 1,000 settlers in all. It blazed a broad trail across the mountains. It opened the Northwest for American emigration. It settled Oregon for the United States. And as the result of that settlement, when the northwest boundary line was determined, in 1846, the United States claimed as its own the territory which, five years before, they would have ceded as worthless and undesirable. The stretch of country which Whitman saved to the United States is equal in area to all of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, and three Connecticuts beside. It belongs to the United States to-day, and not to Great Britain, because of Marcus Whitman the missionary.

But the prophet and hero was to become a true martyr as well. On November 29, 1847, the Indian war-whoop rang around the mission station at Walilatpu. An Indian hatchet flashed, and Whitman fell a victim to the savage cruelty and ignorance of those whom he had come to save. The mission was destroyed. His work was obliterated. For eleven years the land lay desolate, inhabited only by the Indian and the coyote. Then, in 1859, Cushing Eells, who had himself gone as missionary to the Indians in 1838, but had escaped the Indian massacre, came and stood by Whitman's grave. He found that the bones of those who had been massacred, fourteen persons in all, had been gathered together into one great grave. Standing by the grave he thought of Whitman's life and death, and of his services to the United States. The past, the present, and the future came before him. The "power of the Most High" came upon him, and he resolved that, God helping him, he would devote the remainder of his life to establishing a worthy memorial of Marcus Whitman.

HINDU INTOLERANCE.

Recent litigation in India furnishes decisive contradiction to one of the statements made at the Chicago Parliament of Religions. There was no speech at the Parliament that more favorably impressed the Christian public than that of Swami Vivekananda. In a recent issue of this journal Mr. Rutnam showed the misleading character of that speech and now comes the legal report showing that there was one particular in which it was entirely erroneous. Vivekananda declared that one of the chief beauties of Hinduism was its broad and generous spirit of toleration. "I am proud," he said, "to belong to a religion which has taught the world both tolerance and universal acceptance. We believe not only in universal toleration, but we accept all religions as true." Now for a specimen of this boasted tolerance. A case which has just reached a final decision after being heard in several courts in India bears upon the rights of converts to Christianity in the care of their own children. A Hindu and his wife professed conversion, and were baptized some three years ago, together with their two young children. Afterward the wife, under pressure from her relatives, renounced her Christian faith and left her husband. The father sought the custody of his children and the chief court of Mysore has just decided that according to Hindu law a parent loses his right to the custody of his children by reason of his having become a Christian. There cannot be much tolerance in a religion which forbids a Christian having the custody of his own children.

A RAILROAD MAN'S PRAYER.

An old railroad worker was converted, and being present at a meeting at which there were many inquirers, he was asked to lead in prayer. He hesitated a moment, and then with trembling lips, but clear, resounding voice, he said reverently: "O, Lord, now that I have flagged Thee, lift up my feet from the rough road of life and plant them safely on the deck of the train of salvation. Let me use the safety lamp, known as prudence, make all the couplings in the train with the strong link of Thy love, and let my hand-lamp be the Bible. And, Heavenly Father, keep all switches closed that lead off on the sidings, especially those with a blind end. O, Lord, if it be Thy pleasure, have every semaphore block along the line show the white light of hope, that I may make the run of life without stopping. And, Lord, give us the ten commandments for a schedule; and when I have finished the run, on schedule time, pulled into the great dark station of death, may Thou, the Superintendent of the universe, say, 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant; come and sign the payroll and receive your check for eternal happiness.'"

MISSIONARIES AS LIFE-SAVERS.

Hundreds of Soldiers on the Manchurian Battlefields Saved by Red Cross and Medical Missionaries—A Striking Proof of the Value of Medical Training.

WITHIN the last ten years, the value of medical training as an adjunct to Gospel work has begun to be appreciated in almost every field of missionary effort. It has come to be recognized that no mission work is complete without its medical staff, and in a multitude of instances, it has been demonstrated that the consecrated medical missionary can win his way to the hearts of men where no other means would have sufficed. The experience of such men as Rev. Dr. Nassau at Corisco, West Africa, Dr. Kerr in Canton, China, Dr. Hall in Corea, and the late old John Gilmour in Mongolia, all goes to show the value of medical training in the mission field. It has, moreover, been the consistent policy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to point out to all who contemplate foreign missionary work, that it is well to bear these facts prominently in view.

THE HOSPITAL GUARD.

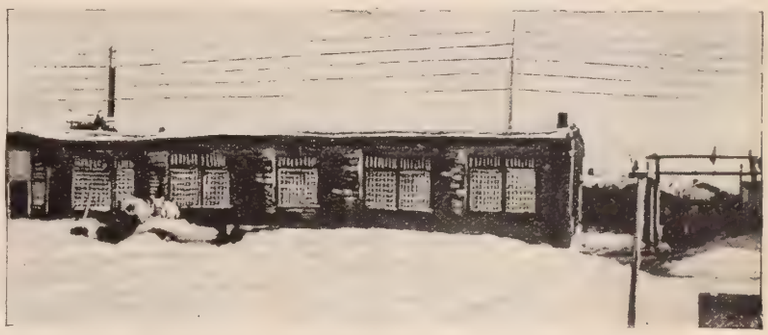
CARRYING A WOUNDED SOLDIER.

In the recent war between China and Japan, and long before the termination of hostilities, permission was granted by the Japanese government to the Protestant missionaries to work in the camps, barracks and hospitals. This was a wonderful and providential opening, and was immediately seized by the missionaries, several of whom found abundant opportunities for the exercise of their medical skill among the sick and wounded.

On the other hand, the same opportunity was not afforded to the missionaries to work among the Chinese troops. The Red Cross Society, however, did most efficient service at many points in Chinese territory. A letter received from Mr. Robert G. Denig, United States Navy, and stationed at New-Chwang, gives some interesting facts concerning the Red Cross work. Mr. Denig writes as follows:

"Had it not been for the disinterested foreigners in New-Chwang and Yin-kow, the Chinese soldiers of the Manchurian armies, under Generals Sung, Chiang and Woo, would have been utterly without medical assistance. Through the efforts of Dr. Young, an English missionary, some $1200 were obtained, some of it from foreign residents of Shanghai, most of it from the Red Cross Society. This money, along with 1500 taels, subscribed by the wealthy Chinese merchants of this place, was devoted to the establishment of hospitals that have all winter been doing good work under the flag of the Geneva Cross. Strictly speaking, they are not Red Cross hospitals, for China has never signed the article of the Geneva convention. However that may be, suffering humanity was never in greater need of medical aid than the so-called Chinese army, for the surgeon or doctor had no place in the organization of the armed forces that were steadily retreating across the frozen plains of Manchuria.

"To the Chinese, a wounded man, a sick man, or one with his feet frozen, is virtually a dead man; to repair him to fight again or to send home is considered a sheer waste of time, money and labor, so much more easy is it to fill his place by a new recruit, physically sound and not yet terror-stricken by the singing of a Japanese bullet. Dr. Daly, the resident physician, Dr. W. F. Arnold, U. S. Navy; Dr. Penny, H. M. S. "Firebrand," and Doctors Christie, Brander, Greig, Gordon, and Grey of the Scotch and Irish Presbyterian Mission, composed the medical staff. To Dr. W. F. Arnold is due the credit of systematizing the work, as he was the principal consulting surgeon. He invented much-needed and practical appliances, yet found time to keep a careful record of each case, and his analysis of this record will make a valuable addition to our knowledge of gun-shot wounds.



AN IMPROVISED MILITARY HOSPITAL AT NEW-CHWANG.

"The missionaries, medical and laymen, were an absolute necessity as interpreters, not only of the language, but of the Chinese character and customs.

"Until the battle of Ta Ping Shan, which occurred on Febr. 24th, not a soldier was removed from the battle field, except by his own efforts and at his own expense. This date is the first instance of the wounded being removed as a military measure. As several hundred were brought, the losses in previous battles can only be conjectured. It was also a sign of growing confidence. Soldiers were put on guard at the hospitals. The Tas Tai, or prefect, of the city, furnished for the first time subsistence, equal to ten cents per day, for each man.

"Many wounded arrived after long neglect, or worse still, after frightful mal-treatment. A certain Mohammedan Chinese quack, who chased the army about on a Bactrian camel, was responsible for much of this. He poured mercury in the wounds to melt the bullet. In one authentic instance a wound was found actually stuffed with the cremated remains of a rat. There have been many instances of wonderful endurance. A man from Kin Chow, (leg fractured with a bullet) hid in a hole four days without bread or water, crawled on his hands and knees eight miles through snow and cold, then walked or was carried the remaining distance of seventy miles. He has been discharged with a sound leg. Following each battle was severe cold, if not a blizzard. Two days after the battle of Tien Chwang Tai (Japanese, Denshodi), I visited the scene and among the hundreds of corpses frozen to the ground were some that clearly indicated they had crawled into hiding and there frozen in their own blood. The battles of Kai Chan and Ta Ping Shan were fought with the thermometer 8° to 12° below zero, and forty per cent. of the wounded were suffering, when brought in, the additional tortures of frozen hands and feet.

"The surgeon in charge here had a hard struggle to perform the necessary amputation against the inborn prejudices of the Chinese. Not a few men deliberately refused to lose a limb, preferring death instead, saying they could not undertake the long journey in the next world in a maimed condition. They would furthermore be entitled to a sort of back seat in Paradise, when they did arrive.

BUSINESS TROUBLES.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Ezekiel 27: 24: "These were thy merchants in all sorts of things."

WE are at the opening door of returning national prosperity. The coming crops, the re-establishment of public confidence, and, above all, the blessing of God, will turn in upon all sections of America the widest, greatest prosperity this country has ever seen. But that door of successes is not yet fully open, and thousands of business men are yet suffering from the distressing times through which we have been passing.

Some of the best men in the land have faltered; men whose hearts are enlisted in every good work, and whose hands have blessed every great charity. The Church of God can afford to extend to them her sympathies, and plead before heaven with all-availing prayer. The schools such men have established, the churches they have built, the asylums and beneficent institutions they have fostered, will be their eulogy long after their banking institutions are forgotten. Such men can never fail. They have their treasures in banks that never break, and will be millionaires forever. But I thought it would be appropriate, to-day, and useful, for me to talk about the trials and temptations of our business men, and try to offer some curative prescriptions.

In the first place, I have to remark that a great many of our business men feel ruinous trials and temptations coming to them from small and limited capital in business. It is everywhere understood that it takes now three or four times as much to do business well as once it did. Once, a few hundred dollars were turned into goods—the merchant would be his own store-sweeper, his own salesman, his own book-keeper; he would manage all the affairs himself, and everything would be net profit. Wonderful changes have come; costly apparatus, extensive advertising, exorbitant store rents, heavy taxation, expensive agencies are only parts of the demand made upon our commercial men: and when they have found themselves in such circumstances with small capital, they have sometimes been tempted to run against the rocks of moral and financial destruction. This temptation of limited capital has ruined men in two ways. Sometimes they have shrunk down under the temptation. They have yielded the battle before the first shot was fired. At the first hard dun they surrendered. Their knees knocked together at the fall of the auctioneer's hammer. They blanched at the financial peril. They did not understand that there is such a thing as heroism in merchandise, and that there are Waterloos of the counter, and that a man can fight no braver battle with the sword than he can with the yard-stick. Their souls melted in them because sugars were up when they wanted to buy, and down when they wanted to sell, and unsaleable goods were on the shelf, and bad debts in their ledger. The gloom of their countenances overshadowed even their dry goods and groceries. Insolvency, coming from limited capital, blasted them. Others have felt it in a different way. They have said: "Here I have been trudging along. I have been trying to be honest all [illegible]. I find it is of no use. Now it is make or break." The small craft that could have stood the stream, is put out beyond the light-house, on the great sea of speculation. He borrows a few thousand dollars from friends who dare not refuse him, and he goes bartering on a large scale. He reasons in this way: "Perhaps I may succeed, and if I don't I will be no worse off than I am now, for a hundred thousand dollars taken from nothing, nothing remains." Stocks are the dice with which he gambles. He bought for a few dollars vast tracts of Western land. Some man at the East, living on a fat homestead, meets this gambler of fortune, and is persuaded to trade off his estate for lots in a Western city with large avenues, and costly palaces, and lake steamers smoking at the wharves, and rail-trains coming down with lightning speed from every direction. There it is, all on paper! The city has never been built, nor the railroads constructed, but everything points that way, and the thing will be done as sure as you live. Well, the man goes on, stopping at no fraud or outrage. In his splendid equipage he dashes past, while the honest laborer looks up, and wipes the sweat from his brow, and says, "I wonder where that man got all his money." After awhile the bubble bursts. Creditors rush in. The law clutches, but finds nothing in its grasp. The men who were swindled say: "I don't know how I could have ever been deceived by that man;" and the pictorials, in handsome wood-cuts, set forth the hero who in ten years had genius enough to fail for $150,000!

And that is the process by which many have been tempted through limitation of capital, to rush into labyrinths from which they could not be extricated. I would not want to chain honest enterprise. I would not want to block up any of the avenues for honest accumulation that open before young men. On the contrary, I would like to cheer them on, and rejoice when they reach the goal; but when there are such multitudes of men going to ruin for this life and the life that is to come, through wrong notions of what are lawful spheres of enterprise, it is the duty of the Church of God, and the ministers of religion, and the friends of all young men, to utter a plain, emphatic, unmistakable protest. These are the influences that drown men in destruction and perdition.

Again: a great many of our business men are tempted to over-anxiety and care. You know that nearly all commercial businesses are overdone in this day. Smitten with the love of quick gain, our cities are crowded with men resolved to be rich at all hazards. They do not care how money comes, if it only comes. Our best merchants are thrown into competition with men of more means and less conscience, and if an opportunity of accumulation be neglected one hour, some one else picks it up. From January to December the struggle goes on. Night gives no quiet to limbs tossing in restlessness, nor to a brain that will not stop thinking. The dreams are harrowed by imaginary loss, and flushed with imaginary gains. Even the Sabbath cannot dam back the tide of anxiety; for this wave of worldliness dashes clear over the Sabbaths, and leaves its foam on Psalms and prayer-books. Men who are living on salaries, or by the cultivation of the soil, cannot understand the wear and tear of the body and mind to which our merchants are subjected, when they do not know but that their livelihood and their business honor are dependent upon the uncertainties of the next hour. This excitement of the brain, this corroding care of the heart, this strain of effort that exhausts the spirit, sends a great many of our best men, in middle-life, into the grave. Their life dashed out against money safes. They go with their store on their backs. They trudge like camels, sweating, from Aleppo to Damascus. They make their life a crucifixion. Standing behind desks and counters, banished from the fresh air, weighed down by carking cares, they are so many suicides. Oh! I wish I could, to-day, rub out some of these lines of care; that I could lift some of the burdens from the heart; that I could give relaxation to some of these worn muscles. It is time for you to begin to take it a little easier. Do your best, and then trust God for the rest. Do not fret. God manages all the affairs of your life, and he manages them for the best. Consider the lilies—they always have robes. Behold the fowls of the air—they always have nests. Take a long breath. Bethink, betimes, that God did not make you for a pack-horse. Dig yourselves out from among the hogsheads and the shelves, and in the light of the holy Sabbath day resolve that you will give to the winds your fears, and your fretfulness, and your distresses. You brought nothing into the world, and it is very certain you can carry nothing out. Having food and raiment, be therewith content. The merchant came home from the store. There had been a great disaster there. He opened the front door, and said, in the midst of his family circle: "I am ruined. Everything is gone. I am all ruined." His wife said: "I am left;" and the little child threw up its hands and said: "Papa, I am here." The aged grandmother, seated in the room, said: "Then you have all the promises of God beside, John." And he burst into tears, and said: "God forgive me, that I have been so ungrateful. I find I have a great many things left. God forgive me."

Again I remark, that many of our business men are tempted to neglect their home duties. How often it is that the store and the home seem to clash, but there ought not to be any collision. It is often the case that the father is the mere treasurer of the family, a sort of agent to see that they have dry goods and groceries. The work of family government he does not touch. Once or twice in a year he calls the children up on a Sabbath afternoon, when he has a half-hour he does not exactly know what to do with, and in that half-hour he disciplines the children, and chides them and corrects their faults, and gives them a great deal of good advice, and then wonders all the rest of the year that his children do not do better, when they have the wonderful advantage of that semi-annual castigation.

The family table, which ought to be the place for pleasant discussion and cheerfulness, often becomes the place of perilous expedition. If there be any blessing asked at all, it is cut off at both ends, and with the hand on the carving knife. He counts on his fingers, making estimates in the interstices of the repast. The work done, the hat goes to the head, and he starts down the street, and before the family have arisen from the table, he has bound up another bundle of goods, and says to the customer: "Anything more I can do for you to-day, sir?" A man has more responsibilities than those which are discharged by putting competent instructors over his children, and giving them a drawing-master and a music-teacher. The physical culture of the child will not be attended to unless the father looks to it. He must sometimes lose his dignity. He must unlimber his joints. He must sometimes lead them out to their sports and games. The parent who cannot forget the severe duties of life sometimes, to fly the kite, and trundle the hoop, and chase the ball, a[nd] jump the rope with his children, ou[r] never to have been tempted out of a cru[el] and unredeemable solitariness. If [you] want to keep your children away fr[om] places of sin, you can only do it by m[ak]ing your home attractive. You may pre[ach] sermons, and advocate reforms, and [de]nounce wickedness, and yet your child will be captivated by the glittering sal[oon] of sin, unless you can make your hon[e] brighter place than any other place [on] earth to them. Oh! gather all cha[rms] into your house. If you can afford [it], bring books, and pictures, and cheerful [en]tertainments to the household. But, ab[ove] all, teach those children, not by half [an] hour twice a year on the Sabbath-day, [but] day after day; and every day teach th[em] that religion is a great gladness, tha[t] throws chains of gold about the neck, [and] it takes no spring from the foot, no bli[th]ness from the heart, no sparkle from [the] eye, no ring from the laughter; but [that] "her ways are ways of pleasantness, [and] all her paths are peace." I sympat[hize] with the work being done in many of [our] cities, by which beautiful rooms are [set] apart by our Young Men's Christian [As]sociations, and I pray God to prosper t[hem] in all things. But I tell you there is so[me]thing back of that and before that: [we] need more happy, consecrated, cheer[ful] Christian homes everywhere.

Again I remark: that a great man[y] our business men are tempted to put th[e] tainment of money above the value of [the] soul. It is a grand thing to have plenty [of] money. The more you get of it, the [bet]ter, if it come honestly and go useft[ully]. For the lack of it, sickness dies with[out] medicine, and hunger finds its coffin in [the] empty bread tray, and nakedness shi[vers] for lack of clothes and fire. When I he[ar a] man in canting tirade against money [as] Christian man—as though it had no [pos]sible use on earth, and he had no intere[st] it at all, I come almost to think that [the] heaven that would be appropriate for [him] would be an everlasting poor-house. W[ell], my friends, we do admit there is such a thing as the lawful use of money—a pr[ac]table use of money—let us recognize [al]so the fact that money cannot satisfy a m[an's] soul, that it cannot glitter in the dark [val]ley, that it cannot pay our fare across [the] Jordan of death, that it cannot unlock [the] gate of heaven. There are men in all [oc]cupations who seem to act as though [they] thought that a pack of bonds and m[or]gages could be traded off for a title to heaven, and as though gold would be a lawful tender in that place where it is so common that they make pavements of it. Salvation by Christ is the only sa[lva]tion. Treasures in heaven are the only [in]corruptible treasures.

Have you ever ciphered out in the le[dger] of Loss and Gain the sum: "What will it profit a man if he gain the whole w[or]ld and lose his own soul?" However [ri]ch your apparel, the winds of death will [tat]ter it like rags. Homespun and a th[re]bare coat have sometimes been the sha[dow] of coming robes made white in the blo[od] of the Lamb. The pearl of great pri[ce] is worth more than any gem you can [dr]ag from the ocean, than Australian or B[raz]ilian mines strung in one carcanet. [Seek] after God; find his righteousness, and all shall be well here; all shall be well [ev]ereafter.

Some of you remember, the shipwre[ck] of the "Central America." That [ill]-fated steamer had, I think, about five hu[ndred] passengers aboard. Suddenly the st[orm] came, and the surges trampled the [de]cks and swung into the hatches, and there [went] up a hundred-voiced death-shriek. [White] foam on the jaw of the wave. The p[itch]ing of the steamer as though it were [cli]mbing a mountain. The dismal flare of [the] signal rockets. The long cough of [the] steam-pipes. The hiss of extinguished furnaces. The walking of God on [the] wave! The steamer went not down [wi]thout a struggle. As the passengers [ra]llied themselves in rows, to bale or [pu]mp ssel, hark to the thump of the buckets, men unused to toil, with blistered hands

d strained muscle, tug for their lives.
here is a sail seen against the sky. The sh of the distress gun is noticed, its voice ard not, for it is choked in the louder oming of the sea. A few passengers caped; but the steamer gave one great ch and was gone! So there are some en who sail on prosperously in life. All's ell; all's well. But at last, some finan-l disaster comes: a euroclydon. Down ey go! The bottom of the commercial sea strewn with shattered hulks. But be-use your property goes, do not let your ul go. Though all else perish, save that;
I have to tell you of a more stupendous ipwreck than that which I just men-
ned. God launched this world six thou-nd years ago. It has been going on der freight of mountains and immortals;
t one day it will stagger at the cry of
e. The timbers of rock will burn, the ountains flame like masts, and the clouds e sails in the judgment hurricane. Then od shall take the passengers off the deck, d from the berths those who have long en asleep in Jesus, and he will set them
r beyond the reach of storm and peril.
ut how many shall go down will never be own, untill it shall be announced one y in heaven; the shipwreck of a world!
many millions saved! So many milli-ns drowned! Oh! my dear hearers, hatever you lose, though your houses go, ough your lands go, though all your rthly possessions perish, may God Alighty, through the blood of the everlast-g covenant, save all your souls.

WORK IN BUENOS AYRES.

Several interesting conversions are re-rted by Mr. W. C. Morris, who about x years ago commenced a mission in Bue-s Ayres, the capital of the Argentine Re-ublic. It encountered bitter opposition at st, both from the people who belonged to e Romish Church, and the people who longed to no church and feared that the w religion might curtail the profits of eir business, which flourished on wicked-ss. But the mission has survived all oposition, and there are now regular servi-
s. They are conducted alternately in nglish and Spanish, and at the former ere are usually from 150 to 200 persons esent. At the Spanish services the audi-ces vary from 200 to 300. A great deal house-to-house visiting is done. Mr.
orris says: "One of our members is an d lady who was drawn toward the Sa-our at the bedside of her dying son, as e read and talked and prayed. After his ath, she began to attend the services. A tle later, she was delivered from the dark-ss, and notwithstanding the threats of the iests, the denunciations and entreaties of e nuns, and the ridicule of some friends nd relatives, she left the Church of Rome, tained a Bible, and prayerfully entered on the Christian life. Amid very much ouble, she holds on faithfully. Since her nversion, five of her relatives have en-red the way of holiness. Another mem-r is a little Spanish girl who first came one to our Spanish Sunday School, and terward succeeded in bringing her moth-
, who in turn coaxed her husband and l her family. Now not only does she beng to the Lord, but her father (who was drunkard and a gambler), mother, and two others also have been converted."

CHRIST'S.

CHRIST'S! I am Christ's! and let the name suffice you;
Aye, for me, too, he greatly hath sufficed;
. with no winning words I would entice you;
Paul has no honor and no friend but Christ.
es, without cheer of sister or of daughter—

Pass I in patience till the work be done.
earts I have won of sister or of brother
Quick on the earth or hidden in the sod

—REV. F. W. H. MEYER.

Missionaries as Life-Savers.

The struggle for existence in China is so great that some chose death to the fight for mere life, minus a leg or an arm. Yet the total percentage of deaths is not large, being only six per cent. of all treated.

"That the Chinese have been gradually forced to the recognition of the hospitals and the good work they have done is, I am convinced, due to the gratitude of the soldiers treated within them, for even Chinese have some appreciation of kindness. On January 13, twenty-six healed patients presented a 'bienga' or tablet inscribed with the four gilt characters:

Jos tchow hwei shung,

one of those beautiful sentiments for which they are noted:

Life returns at the touch of the hand.

"This tablet was carried about the city with the usual accompaniment of drums, gongs, horns and banners followed by the givers. Arriving at the hospital it was placed over the entrance, the band all the while making hideous slow music. The instant the placque was in place innumerable packs of firecrackers were exploded all round the outer walls to prevent evil spirits forever after entering the place. On the left of the inscription were the names of the donor, on the right those of three surgeons. The first, of Dr. Arnold, literally translated, read as follows: 'American, Kingdom, Soldier, Ship, Medicine, Officer, Ah (Arnold), venerable gentleman.'

"The tablet mode of expressing gratitude is a favorite one with these people. Gen. Chiang, who was so grievously defeated at Kai Chan on January 10, presented a similar and far more gorgeous one. Gen. Sung, before he so ignominiously fled from New Chwang, gave the hospitals 500 taels.

PRESENTING A MEMORIAL TABLET TO THE RED CROSS

The Viceroy of Nankin has given the sum of 10,000 taels to the promotion of the Red Cross movement in China. This circumstance is of great importance as it shows one at least of many civilizing influences that will be the outcome of this war."

In his letter, Mr. Denig further adds that Chinese inns—miserable places mostly—are used as hospitals. One of these improvised hospitals, well-nigh half hidden by snow, is given in the photograph on the first page. The inn is usually a long, low structure, with flat, thatched roof and with a spacious court-yard. Some few have glass-windows and a stove. Another illustration shows the clumsy and brutal method of carrying a sick or wounded man to hospital, bundled carelessly in a rude basket, sometimes called a "Manchurian cart," which is slung from a pole, carried on the shoulders of two coolies. It is not an infrequent thing for the bearers to discover that their patient has expired before the hospital is reached. Another photograph is that of a military attache, mounted on a dromedary, and ready to set out on a journey across the snows, probably to the next military post. The bleak Manchurian climate compels the wearing of warm clothing, and the common outer garment is made of sheepskin, which is worn with the wool next to the body. The sentinel at the gate, armed with a stout staff as his only weapon, is a familiar figure.

The Chinese soldier has no bedding, save his clothing, and that is seemingly unlimited. The difficulty of attending to patients in such hospitals, under these peculiar circumstances, may be imagined. All the sanitary conditions are unfavorable, and there is a lack of everything that would aid the physician in his treatment of the sufferers. To hospitals of this character in New-Chwang, there were brought prisoners from the battle-fields of Tai-Lien-Wan, Hai-Chung, Kai-Chan, Kang-Wan-Zai, and Ta-Ping-Shan—about 850 in all. Before the victorious Japanese, the Manchu braves with their banners, gongals, and modern rifles disappeared like snow before the sun. Sixty per cent. of the wounded were shot in the back. There were no sword wounds treated at the New-Chwang hospitals. When the Japanese army advanced to occupy the place, sixty patients escaped from the hospital and fled with the retreating troops. One terrified patient committed suicide by swallowing rude nuggets of silver, such as are used as currency in that part of the Mongol domains.

All the experiences of these Red Cross workers in Manchuria demonstrated the great value of medical training, and furnished additional proof of the desirability of such training forming an essential part of the missionary equipment for service in foreign fields.

A Glance at Missions.

Some Facts which Those who are Sceptical may well Ponder.

DURING an address delivered at the annual meeting of the Baptist Missionary Society in London, Lord Overtoun, the Chairman, gave the following concise yet comprehensive review of Christian missionary progress:

"The Christians of the world have now 7,000 missionaries laboring in the world, with an income of two and a-quarter millions of pounds sterling. These labors have been productive of the most wonderful results, and miracles have been wrought in many lands. The Sandwich Islands, where, in 1778, Captain Cook was murdered, were, within fifty years of the first Gospel preached, entirely Christianized, and the total cost involved was less than half what is now paid for an ironclad. The fierce Bechuanas of South Africa, through the labors of the gentle Dr. Moffat, were transformed into Christians, and now in India there are thirty-five societies engaged in preaching and teaching the Word. In Japan, where twenty-seven years ago there was only one Christian building, there are now ninety-two. The romance of the New Hebrides, as told by that venerable missionary, Dr. Paton, is a story that one never wearies of reading, and now the twenty-three islands there can tell the story of fourteen thousand converts.

"The American missions have labored against vast difficulties in the East. The heroic Mackay laid deep the foundations of the Gospel in Uganda, and in the South of Africa the Gospel has introduced an industrial system, centred at Lovedale, that has wrought a transformation in many parts of Africa.

"The Livingstonia Mission in Central Africa, began as a monument to that great son of Scotland who died in Ilala, on his knees, in 1873, and where, through the preaching of the Word, slavery is destined soon to receive its deathblow, and I trust that open sore of the world, of which Dr. Livingston wrote, healed. At Livingstonia we have now forty schools, and 700 children under teaching. We have twenty-three European missionaries and 130 native teachers and evangelists, also medical missionaries and teaching and industrial missions, and are engaged in starting a training institute for the qualification of native teachers and evangelists, and we have much cause to thank God for the blessing he has given.

"During the nineteen years that we have been working there, seventeen of our laborers have laid down their lives, and unbelievers might ask, 'To what purpose is this waste?' But these men have laid deep the foundations of the Gospel of Christ in their tears and with their blood. Have they died in vain? Or has Christ died in vain? Shall we not seek to press on this work till the Dark Continent is lightened all over by the Gospel?"

OUR CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

VI. MRS. L. J. STAPLER.

THERE is mourning in the Indian Territory, and with good reason, over the death of one who loved her people and, like her Master, "loved them unto the end." Mrs. Stapler belonged to the Cherokee nation and was a niece of the famous chief John Ross, who in the division of the nation, was the leader of the party who insisted on the Indians' rights. She was born on the old reservation in Georgia, at New Echota, in August, 1825. Her father was Elijah Hicks, the trusted guide and counsellor of the tribe in their troubles, which culminated in their removal from the State in 1836. She was among the first thousand of the emigration which began in August and did not finally reach their destination until January. By that time nearly two hundred were dead and the tribe settled down in their new home, under a cloud of sorrow and discouragement. The missionaries were faithful to them, and in the school they established, called the Dwight mission, the eleven-year-old Cherokee girl received her first teaching. Afterwards she studied at Lawrenceville, N. J., where she showed exceptional ability and attain a high standard of education. She then went back to her father's home at Tahlequah and lived a helpful life among her own people, aiding her Indian sisters in the Territory.

During a tour, she took under the care of her uncle, John Ross, she visited Washington, Baltimore, and other cities. At Wilmington, Del., they stayed with Mr. Stapler, an excellent Quaker, whose sister was the wife of Chief Ross. Mr. Stapler formed a deep attachment to the young Cherokee girl, and afterwards married her and went to live in the Territory. He was a bright, earnest, faithful Christian, and with his wife took an active interest in all the religious work among the tribe. Their life continued peaceful and prosperous until the outbreak of the war. Then trouble came. The Cherokees, in spite of all Mr. and Mrs. Stapler could do, became restless, and were drawn into the maelstrom of the strife. Four children had by that time come to brighten the Stapler' home, and with these they set out in the early dawn of a spring morning for Fort Scott, Kans., whence they were sent forward to Wilmington, Del., where they remained until the close of the war.

In 1866, Mr. and Mrs. Stapler were once more in the Territory, beginning life over again, as so many were all over the Union. It was hard work, for their property was destroyed, and their capital impaired, but both had energy and industry, and they started with strong faith in God. Nor did they suffer their business cares to curtail their Christian work. Mrs. Stapler became Superintendent of the Sunday School, a position she held uninterruptedly for twenty-seven years. She also organized a Temperance society, which developed into a Women's Christian Temperance Union. Mrs. Stapler was first President of both the local and the Territorial Union, and to the last was an active worker in the cause. She also made regular visits to the prison, and in other ways tried to win souls for Christ. Mr. Stapler died several years ago, but his widow made no abatement in her labors.

NADAB AND ABIHU.

S. S. Lesson for July 21. Lev. 10: 1-11. Golden Text Ps. 19: 13. By Mrs. Baxter.

OUR Golden Text is a prayer: "Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me; then shall I be perfect, and I shall be clear from great transgression." David, who is the author of this Psalm, was a king; the two men, Nadab and Abihu, whose sin is our subject, were priests; kings and priests can sin presumptuous sins against him who is King over all. The very fact that God has committed to any man a place of power and authority over others, increases the responsibility of such an one in the ratio of the power which is committed to him; he of all others must not presume.

Most solemnly had Aaron and his sons, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, been consecrated to

of their office. In comparing Lev. 8 with Ex. 29, we find that in every several particular, God's commandment to Moses given on the mountain before Aaron's sin of the golden calf, was carried out to the letter, even though Aaron had so grievously failed. "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance." In the presence of assembled Israel, these men were brought before the Lord (Lev. 8: 1-5). And Moses washed them with water, and clothed them with the holy garments. Before any can enter upon priestly functions, he must know the cleansing, which only the servant of Jehovah, of whom Moses was a type, can accomplish. He only can "purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, and they offer unto the Lord offerings in righteousness" (Mal. 3: 2, 3). He only can clothe a sinful being with priestly garments, which are made "for glory and for beauty" (Exod. 28: 2). Let no child of God think that in him dwells either glory or beauty; the very goodliness of the flesh is as the flower of the field destined for the fire. Its nature is to degenerate and wither (Ps. 40: 6-8).

"He girded him" is twice mentioned (v. 7). God alone can gird his own to make their way perfect (Ps. 18: 2). And he placed the breastplate upon him. "No other hand but that of Christ, the true Servant of Jehovah, can place on the heart of his priestly ones the spirit of intercession. This is a thing not created or willed by man; it comes from without, and is the gift of God proceeding from his spirit, which helpeth our infirmities and maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered" (Rom 8: 26, 27), and in the breastplate he put the Urim and the Thummim (or the Lights and Perfections, R. V., margin). The heart of Aaron was to be hid in God; no light or perfection from his own emotions must go out of it. God must shine forth from the heart of his priest.

Holy to the Lord.

As Moses had done for Aaron, so he did for Aaron's sons; thus Nadab and Abihu were washed, clothed, girded and anointed, as well as their father.

Called thus so solemnly apart from the people for the Lord, Nadab and Abihu were no more their own; all who looked upon them knew by their appearance that they were set apart for God, to be the holy priests of Israel. Their father's sin and their's had been laid on the Lord's offering, they were the Lord's. Moreover the glory of the Lord had appeared unto them. It was on the eighth day, the seven days of their consecration being at an end, when Moses called Aaron and his sons themselves to offer, now that he had offered for them, a special sacrifice unto the Lord, "for," he said, "to-day the Lord appeareth unto you." It was to be the initiation of Aaron into his priestly work, he must offer a sin offering for himself, and a ram for a burnt offering." Atonement, without renewed and entire consecration, is never contemplated in the Word of God.

If the presence of God does not humble to the dust, if it does not cause us as Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and John to fall down at his feet as dead, it is because our own presence, our own self-life, has been in the foreground of our thoughts and our affections, and we have not really seen the glory of the Lord. Nadab and Abihu were perhaps intoxicated with the glory of their position as priests, and perhaps gave themselves up to self-glory, so that the enemy of souls got an easy victory over them. None are so in danger as those in high places, none so open to sin presumptuously. Unless we take and keep the lowest place, we are always in danger. If we forget for a moment that we are, in ourselves, accursed people because of our sins; accursed with him who was "made a curse for us" (Gal. 3: 13), we are exposed to the temptation of the adversary. Nadab and Abihu did not keep low, and thus they sinned.

"Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, took each of them his censer, and put fire therein, and laid incense thereon, and before the Lord, which he had not commanded them." God had sent his fire down from heaven upon the altar, and God's fire was not to be allowed to go out (Lev. 6: 13). Any other fire was a caricature of his; to kindle it was rank idolatry; the substitution of other fire was blasphemy. This was no common sin. And yet, how often in a meeting for evangelization, or for mutual edification, another fire than the Lord's is kindled! How often have we seen fleshly enthusiasm substituted for the power and presence of the Holy Ghost! How often is the excitement of seeing a great crowd hanging upon his words, and the satisfaction of being appreciated, the fire which kindles eloquence in the heart of many a popular preacher! And yet this is strange fire; it is not the holy sobriety which waits reverently for a word from the Lord, and which will not speak any but his words, his unadulterated message, as Ezekiel learned to do (Ezek. 2: 7). It is a fire which ministers to self-glory and self-satisfaction, and nourishes that which God's fire destroys. There are many who kindle their own fire (Isa. 50: 11), instead of waiting for the Lord's fire, but he says: "This shall ye have of my hand; ye shall lie down in sorrow."

These young men were unpardonable, because of the responsibility of their position. "There went out fire from the Lord and devoured them, and they died before the Lord" (chap 10: 2.) It must have been an awful moment for Aaron, their father; he had deeply sinned in the matter of the golden calf, and God had not only spared him, but called him to the office of high priest. Had he walked closely with God at that time of sin and shame, it might have been that his sons would not have trangressed now, and Aaron learned that God does indeed visit the sins of the fathers upon the children. And he learned a deep lesson, for he who had excused himself about the golden calf, now held his peace, when Moses sternly said to him from the Lord: "I will be sanctified in and before all the people will I be glorified," and he submitted without a word when his first cousins were commanded by Moses to come and carry the corpses of the offenders out of the camp, and when the still more difficult command was given to him and to his remaining sons to shew no sign of mourning lest they also should die; because the anointing of the Lord was upon them. "They did according to the word of Moses." There may be, and almost certainly is, a direct connection between the sin of these young men and the command which immediately follows it. This came direct from the Lord, without Moses' intervention: "Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die; it shall be a statute forever throughout your generations; and that ye may put a difference between holy and unholy, and between clean and unclean; and that ye may teach the children of Israel all the statutes which the Lord hath spoken unto them by the hand of Moses." These young men may have been excited by wine as well as uplifted by their position. Let us learn the solemn lesson of holy sobriety, including but by no means exhausted by abstinence from intoxicants. Let us avoid all in spirit, soul or body which makes self more present to us than our God. "The end of all things is at hand;" there is no time to trifle;" be ye therefore of sound mind and be sober unto prayer."

Them that Come Nigh to Me,

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE mysterious death of Nadab and Abihu has always puzzled Bible students. It is difficult to comprehend from the narrative, the precise nature of their offence. That it was heinous we conclued from the terrible punishment meted out to them; but we are left to deduction for our idea of its exact character. The historian writes as if under the influence of a great horror, about which he would say as little as possible. That it must have been a severe shock to the whole people, we can readily understand. Then, too, their horrible death came at the close of a grand celebration, which made the tragedy all the more conspicuous. This wandering people had set up their place of worship, and it had just been dedicated. A structure of extraordinary beauty it must have been. The minute description given of it, fills us with surprise, as the work of a people just emancipated from slavery, and still without a home. It was small, as it was not intended for a place of meeting. If we accept the general opinion that the cubit was about eighteen inches, the size of the Tabernacle proper was only forty-five feet long, fifteen feet wide, and fifteen feet high. It was composed of planks of the beautiful gray acacia wood, overlaid with gold, each plank fifteen feet long and twenty-seven inches wide. These were set endwise, the lower ends resting in silver sockets, and each plank connected with its neighbor by a species of clamp. The roof was curtains of tapestry. It was surrounded by an enclosed space, measuring fifty feet from the front of the Tabernacle, and fifty from the rear, and thirty on each side, thus giving an area of 11,250 square feet. The whole could be easily taken apart and carried in the caravan from place to place. This beautiful structure was finished and consecrated by solemn ceremonies to the worship of God. The record of the death of the two priests follows immediately on the description of the dedication. The two men went into the tabernacle, carrying their censers, and were struck dead as if by lightning. They were buried ignominously, as they had fallen; and their nearest relatives were forbidden to mourn for them. It was part of the priest's duty to take the censer, a metal receptacle for live coals, and sprinkle on them incense, consisting of aromatic gums, from which smoke richly perfumed rose through apertures in the lid of the censer. The live coals were to be taken from the fire on the altar, which tradition says was kept perpetually burning, from the time it was miraculously kindled in the wilderness, for nine hundred years, until the temple was destroyed. The natural inference from the record is that the two men used fire from another source. Another suggestion is that they went into the Holy Place, into which only the High Priest was permitted to go. That the offence was something showing levity and disrespect of an outrageous character, there can be no doubt. It was probably committed under the influence of liquor, as a command was issued to the priests immediately after the event, prohibiting them from drinking strong drink when going into the service of the Lord.

Do not drink wine. The late Mr. John B. Gough used to relate an incident which came under his own observation at Halifax, N. S. He made the acquaintance of a sergeant in the citadel, a man of considerable intelligence. He had served in many lands and had seen active service in India. No man in the regiment had a better character. There was not a single bad entry on his record in all the score or more years that had passed since he enlisted. It was within six months of the time when he could retire with a pension, and he often talked with Mr. Gough of what he should do and how he should enjoy life, when he took off his uniform for the last time. But some injudicious friend gave him a bottle of wine, and that night, for the first time since he became a soldier, the sergeant was intoxicated. The quiet, respectful man was completely changed. He was quarrelsome, and when his colonel saw him and remonstrated with him, he snatched up a bayonet and made a lunge that would have killed the colonel had he not sprung aside. The sergeant was court-martialed. It would have gone hard with him but for his previous good conduct. But the offence could no be passed over. He was degraded to the ranks and his pension was forfeited. The man declared that he had not the slightest recollection of what he had done, and every one who knew him believed him. His disgrace and the loss of his pension so preyed on his mind that he committed suicide.

Offered strange fire. A story is told by a well-known writer, of a fortune being lost by a joke. An eccentric bachelor had a large number of nephews and nieces who were all anxious to win his favor. He was the only wealthy member of his family and it was expected that his fortune would go in bulk to some one at his death and would not be divided. In the course of a very busy life he had permitted himself but few pleasures. There was one delight, however, he had never denied himself. He would leave his business at any time to listen to an oratorio. He was an enthusiast in music, but it must be music of a solemn and classical type. For any light and frivolous music he had no liking. Indeed, he abhorred it more than people do, who have no taste for music. The first indication of his selection of an heir, came when having heard one of his nieces play the piano, he declared she had the making of a musician in her and he would pay for her to have a first rate musical educalion. The girl was placed under the tuition of the leading pianist of the day and her uncle was profuse in his provision for the cultivation of her talents. Her progress so charmed him that there was but little doubt of her being his heiress. He gave her many a lecture himself as to what was good and what was vicious in music. But the girl had a delight in mischief; and one day, when her uncle was listening to her playing, she broke suddenly into an air from a comic opera and followed it with some of Offenbach's creations. The man looked horror-stricken. He rose and quitted the room. The next day a brief note came from him referring to the performance as "a studied insult," and declining to pay another cent for the girl's further instruction.

Sanctified in them that come near me. Those who undertake to speak in Christ's name either in the pulpit, the Sunday School, or the home circle, ought to have clean lives. Spurgeon used to say that the flavor of some sermons was spoiled by the thought that had been at home in the mind of the preacher at other times. He compared it to the flavor of a glass of water he bought outside the Cathedral of St. Mark at Venice. The water was good, but some purgent acid had been put in the glass by the person who used it last, and its taste clung to the glass and spoiled the water. Every Christian should take care that no unclean thoughts are in his mind, lest he be not a vessel fit for the Master's use.

Aaron held his peace. To lose his first born and his second son, and to lose them in such a way must have been an awful trial to the father's heart; but he did not murmur. There is probably no surer test of a parent's love for God and faith in him than the way he behaves when his children dies. "Hast not thou forgiven God yet?" asked a pious Quaker of a mourning mother whose passionate wailings continued long after her child had been laid in the grave. Luther, bending over his beloved daughter in her dying hour said: "My beloved Magdalen you would willingly remain with your earthly father, but if God calls you, you will also willingly go to your heavenly father," and the child answered, "Yes, dear father, as God pleases." Then on his knees Luther said: "Dearly do I love her, but O, my God, if it be thy will I resign her."

THEIR HEARTS WITH THE CHILDREN.

ıny Kind Letters Received from Friends who want to Give "Some Little One" a Ten Days' Outing at Mont-Lawn.

OUR children at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Home at Mont-Lawn have thus far been singularly blessed with lovely weather. Each day has brought its own pleasures, and to most the time has passed th surprising rapidity. A greater pleas- e even than the delightful trip up the dson River on the "Chrystenah," is to am in the beautiful woodlands that sur- nd the Home. The grounds, as has been d, are wondrously well placed for a ildren's Home, and there are no neighbors be disturbed by the sound or presence of children as they revel in the sunshine and sh air. Almost daily comes the request: "Teacher, please, may I spend the whole mme here with you?"

Hard indeed is it to refuse pleading lips d eyes eloquent with the request.

Sunday is a peculiarly happy day al- ugh the grounds are alive with the busy dies of the active children, to whom to e is to be physically active. Breakfast, hich consists of cocoa, bread and butter, d boiled eggs, is on that day little later than during the eek. The children form in g line and march while they g gleefully:

Follow, follow, I will follow Jesus, anywhere, everywhere, I will fol- low.

After breakfast, groups of our le ones, each with a mission- y as the centre of interest, are tted over the lawn, eagerly ening to some sweet tale suit- le to childish minds and arts, or to the recital of some aphically-told Bible story. metimes the children form a ster of kindred spirits and g the hymns they all know d love so well.

Of one little maid, who came the Home quite forlorn, but o was carefully tended and thed, as was necessary, came e good news recently: "Since e came back from the Home, e seems quite like a new girl. er mother says she does as e is told, and she is constant- singing the hymns she learn- at the Home. And she has ught them to all the children ho live in the same house with r." Such a report not only akes glad the hearts of the issionaries, but spurs each on exert more direct and helpful fluence over the children.

At half-after ten there is a ort Gospel service, when the ildren are carefully taught the sson, together with the "Gold- Text," and other salient feat- es, in preparation for the regular Sunday chool in the afternoon.

Then, Sunday is eagerly anticipated, for r. Klopsch is always present on that day. e joins heartily in the exercises, and atches with enjoyment the evident pleas- e of the children at their dinner. His ming is hailed with delight, for he is a iversal favorite with the children.

Between dinner and four o'clock, there is nother quiet rest time. At four, is held e Sunday-school, of which Dr. Klopsch Superintendent, and to which all are ger to go. Familiar hymns are sung ith power, and the sound is carried far vay to the hills beyond. The lesson is raphically reviewed, and questions are sked to which come rapid and eager re- ies. Some of the answers are very right, and some even crisp with wit. In nging, sometimes the girls sing the first erse, the boys the second, and so they ternate. Or, if a child has a particularly veet voice, the verses are sung as a solo, e children swelling a loud, full chorus. ne lad, who possessed a very sympa- etic voice, sang most tenderly, "I am so lad that Jesus loves me," and the chorus, ng with hearty good voice, fairly made e rafters ring. At the close of this ser- ice, the children march to the dining-room r supper, to which Dr. Klopsch remains. is a great pleasure to see their hearty en- yment of the ample provision placed be- re them. That such plenty has not always been the case with them is frequently illustrated by remarks overheard in passing. Said one little maid to another, "Does you allus have three meals a day here?" (She had arrived on Saturday evening, and feared the good things of Sunday were never to be duplicated until the week had passed away).

"Yes, allus!" was the hearty, happy reply.

These glimpses into dwarfed lives which chance remarks of the children give to one, only make those who see the work and are partakers, in ever so small a way, of the power of giving pleasure to these little ones, more earnest in the endeavor to make this outing a real blessing to the children. All the surroundings are conducive to the development, in their hearts, of a feeling of kindly love towards each other and of reverent gratitude to the Giver of all good, who has sent them such a pleasant and beneficial outing. In the white dormitories, before the sleepy eyes close at nightfall, many a softly-syllabled prayer is uttered in which the Divine blessing is invoked upon those good friends whose kind ness has helped the Home to welcome and give health and pleasure to so many dear little ones.

Many additional letters, containing expressions of the warmest interest in the Children's Home and its work, have been received at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices. Miss K. S., Cohoes, N. Y., ($2) writes: "Receive this as a token of God's favor for the Children's Home." A friend in Anamosa, Ia., ($1), "To help the cause of our blessed Master, for the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn." C. E. K., Phila., ($3), "I felt I would like to pay for one child's outing." Mrs. A. K., Sharpsburgh, Pa., ($3), "If you send out a little girl with the name of 'Violet' we should be glad to know, as that is the name of our only little girl. May God bless you abundantly with the work." Mrs. L. A. B., White Oak, Ont., Can., ($2). "I am glad to know that a few poor children are being made happy, for a short time, at least." Mrs. J., Ann Arbor, Mich., ($1). "I wish it were more." Mrs. L. M. Whittemore, Mass., ($1), "I wish I could add one hundred. I am greatly interested in this Home." Junior Christian Endeavor Society, Cranford, N. J., per J.W. ($10), "Kindly use the enclosed to send three children to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home." Mrs. J. Hazard, New York City, ($6), "In order that a couple of little waifs many have the benefit of a few days' outing this summer. I wish to make some hearts happy by adding my mite." M. J. W., Dover, N. J., ($3), "To give an outing of ten days to some poor child at the Mont-Lawn Home." Mr. Arthur Meachen, Minneapolis, ($1), writes:

After seeing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for June 19, I felt that I must write and congratulate you upon the success THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has attained in the production of so many beautiful pictures, especially those illustrations depicting the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Nyack, etc. I think such scenes as those must, by God's blessing, fill many Christians with a new inspiration and stimulus and be a means of their going forth with greater Christian activity, and will give them greater zeal in trying to help others and make their lives brighter and more cheerful and to bring them into the everlasting fold of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. God only knows how much the human family need all the sympathy and help heavenward they can get.

H. G. Chase, Waterboro, ($3), writes:

You will find inclosed $3 for the support of one child at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home for ten days and I pray God it may do some poor boy some good and be the means of leading him to Jesus. I am very fond of the little fellows and love them very much. I would like to see them there. The work you are doing in New York is just what I love and sometimes think I must do myself, but I am afraid it is not Jesus calling. I am deeply interested in all you are doing in the Mission and at the Home. May God bless you in your work and permit you to keep on in it for many years.

Dr. Klopsch donated $100 for the purpose of enabling the children at the Home to enjoy a special treat and celebration on the Fourth of July, a circumstance which caused great delight among the young folks on the holiday.

During the month friends have sent in contributions toward the support of the Home for the present season, as follows:

Many New Sunday Schools.

Our Sunday School Missionary's Work During the Spring Months — Still "Calling the Children In."

CONCERNING his work during the last three months—the spring of 1895—Rev. G. W. Sharp, our Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest, makes a most interesting report. It will be remembered that his annual report appeared in these columns in March last. Since that time, despite a dull season and unsettled weather, the work under his hands has continued to prosper. He writes:

"I have much to praise God for on account of the flourishing condition of the schools organized this spring as reported by their officers. One writes: 'Our Sunday School is improving very rapidly.' That school has more than doubled its numbers in three weeks. The Superintendent of another writes that he is expecting to organize 'two more classes in a short time.' The Secretary of a third sends an order for more supplies, adding: 'Our school is increasing so fast that we have not enough supplies for it.' When I organized that school, in April, the total attendance was twenty-three. It now reports five teachers and fifty-eight scholars.

"The prosperity of these and other schools organized this spring is the more gratifying, because they were planted when the work was laborious, sometimes very wearying, on account of the frequent rains, rough and muddy roads, and chilly, damp weather.

"In addition to the literature furnished the schools, I distributed an unusually large amount of Gospel tracts, booklets and religious papers in the homes of the people, on the highway, in the fields, on railroad trains, &c. Where I have found churches without pastors, as far as I could, I have labored to have each church secure one; and I thank God, with gratifying success.

"It has been my privilege to address bodies of Christian Workers, by invitation, such as Young Peoples' Meetings, Societies of Christian Endeavor, Women's Missionary Meetings, Temperance Meetings, Sunday School Institutes, Picnics, and Conventions; and to aid and encourage young men in their preparation for the Gospel ministry. I habitually embrace opportunities of encouraging family devotions in the homes of the people where I lodge, by reading the Scriptures, explaining in a few words the way of salvation, and by family prayer; for many households neglect family religion.

"The one leading desire of my heart and prayer to God in this work remains to be mentioned. His glory in the edification of his people, and in the salvation of sinners. I praise Him that I have seen much of His blessing in the comfort of Christianity and in conversions; but I hope to see far more fruit in eternity.

I tender heartfelt thanks to all who have aided in the work, and ask a continuation of prayers that I may be faithful and efficient in it. And as I have not always found time to answer all the precious letters of sympathy and interest I have received, on account of prolonged absences from home, and pressure of work, I express my gratitude for them in this manner.

SUFFERING LETTERS.

WE are apt to think of the letters of the alphabet as irrational and dumb and dead. But it is a great mistake. They are alive, for they breathe, and speak, and grow eloquent, and weep, and laugh, and suffer. You have probably noticed the family characteristics of some of the letters. There are the Gutturals, who have a harsh voice and talk clear down their throats; the Dentals, who have very prominent teeth; the Liquids, who are noted for smooth manners; and the Labials, who have a great deal of lip. But we propose chiefly to speak of their afflictions.

The letter A is perhaps more fearfully knocked about than any of its comrades. It is married to the queerest wives, and chained to the bloodiest Juggernauts, and wrought into the most repelling combinations. Without any compunctions we say A sloven, A thief, A vagabond, A fool. Though from the position of this letter at the head of the alphabet, we might suppose it would have especial honor, it is flung about as though it had no feelings, no ambitions, no deserts. The grammarian tosses it aside as hardly worthy a thought, calling it an indefinite article, and the orator slurs it as he passes. In all the family of letters we think the letter A suffers the most.

Among the acutest alphabetical griefs are those of the letter T. It never has its own way, for it is constantly being crossed. Most writers, as soon as they have set it up, slash it with the sabre stroke of their steel pen and pass on. However knowing and wise it may be, the school-boy is taught to call it a simple consonant. It is born a mute, and is never allowed to speak from cradle to grave. The only compliment it ever receives is when something complete is said to suit us to a T. Whether it will or not, it is compelled to be the first letter at the Theatre, and to have Tobacco in its mouth, and is always in Taboo and Tantalization. So there is a perpetual tax on T.

Now we pass on to lift up our voice for the letter H. Against it many of the English have a particular grudge. They drive it out of House and Home, and knock it off of Horse, and smash its Hat into "at," and pursue and maltreat it from the English Channel to the Tweed, and will not let it indulge in Hope or take a Horn. It is an aspirate, always panting for better treatment. Thackeray and Dickens did much for the letter H, introducing it into many a "Ha! Ha!" and calling on the [illegible] to quit becoming this Highly Honorable, Honest, Humble, Humorous, Homely, and Humanizing letter H.

Another maltreated member of the alphabet is X. It is seldom invited anywhere. It goes to no party, sits at no banquet, achieves no honors. It is allowed to sidle up to no woman's name, save that of Xantippe, the historical scold. Dictionaries that give near sixteen hundred pages to the consideration of other letters, give only one to this. It seems to have been one of the after-thoughts of the language-makers, and is stuck down nearly at the close. We do not wonder that X is always cross.

There is another whose trouble is that it is worn out and worked to death, and that is the letter O. It is the emotional letter, and has more joys and griefs and violences of feeling than all the others together. If people are delighted with a rainbow or a sunrise or a waterfall, they call on O to help them in expression of pleasure. If they are seized of pain, or run upon by sudden loss, or fall into a ditch, or get seasick, they call violently upon O to help them in expression of distress. When people are exhorting or preaching or praying, and get out of ideas or wind, they fill up the empty places with O. This overworked letter is always kept in motion. It gets fagged out in Fourth of July apostrophes. It must go to all trainings, assist at all fires, and mingle in the riot among the O'Flaherties and the O'Briens and the O'Neils, and the more the brickbats fly, the more boisterous the cries of O! O!

With the sufferings of Z we end our chapter. Where we used to be sent when we missed our lesson at school this unfortunate letter always stands—down foot. There is no chance of it ever getting up. In figures of speech it means the last of everything. If in a "Mercantile Agency" a man is marked A because he has his millions, Z would mean "he is not worth a paper of pins." Though we cannot so much as spell Zone or Zenith or Zodiac without it, in common acceptation this letter is down to Zero. We suppose that when the contriver of the alphabet got through making all the other letters, he let his pen drop on the parchment, and it fell with a zigzag motion that turned out to be the immortal Z.

One day all the letters of the alphabet met in convention on a scholar's desk. They discussed their wrongs and rights. H expressed its aspirations. O broke forth in vehement ejaculation. S and C hissed at much that was said. I occupied more time than belonged to it with an egotistic speech. J followed, in personal appearance very much like I, except that she had a longer trail. Z closed the debate.

As they lingered in knots about the door, we saw four of the letters standing in one place in beautiful line; they were—H O M E, while in one of the galleries there were five or six who happened to form an enchanting group; they were—H E A V E N.

SUING A DEMIJOHN.

A PECULIAR breach of promise suit has been brought in England. A maiden appeals to the court for damages, now that a certain innkeeper refuses to take her in marriage after encouraging her to hope. It is proved that he had the delirium tremens in her house several times. She gets a verdict of ten pounds. Why any woman wants to marry the delirium tremens we know not. She deserved congratulation at escape from such a man, instead of ten pounds for the loss of him. No woman can afford to take a man if she has to have delirium tremens thrown into the bargain. A man is very well, but better no man at all than such an accompaniment. Let women be cautious how they marry men with highly spiced breath, the spice put in to hide whiskey odor. Better pay ten pounds to get rid of him than sue him for ten pounds because he does not marry you. If a man makes for himself unhappy connubial relation, he may run away and so get rid of it; but for a woman wrongly affianced there is no escape. The young man may have glossy hair and bright eyes and immaculate broadcloth; but if he drinks, even moderately, make up your mind that before thirty-five he will do one of two things—either stop drinking entirely or else go to perdition, and if he does the latter he will probably take you along with him.

Mrs. F. Hoskin, Burlington, Colo. Where did the phrase, "Gabriel's Trumpet," originate?

It is not known who first used the phrase, as now written. It probably arose from logically associating Gabriel, the archangel ("Champion of God"), with the special office referred to in 1. Thess. 4: 16 and other passages of like character. All the four archangels are represented as trumpet-bearers.

Perplexity, Conn. How can Christians, who have consecrated themselves and their all to Christ, consistently live and dress in anything but the simplest style, regardless of what fashion may decree; and would not fashion in the sense we commonly use the word come under the head of "the vain pomp and glory of this world?"

While it is clearly wrong and sinful for one professing Christianity to be a devotee of fashion, and given over to vanity, it is also true that there is no good reason why a Christian should dress in garments beneath his or her station in life. In whatever position one is placed in this world, the effort should be made to occupy it to the highest advantage, whether it require the rich robes of a ruler, or the laborer's homespun. Thus we must endeavor to discriminate, and as long as there are inequalities in social life, arising from Divinely permitted causes, just so long must there be distinctions in dress and manner of living. Dressing according to one's station in life, however, is a very different thing from blindly following every new freak of fashion, and indulging all sorts of vanities in apparel.

Mr. Angus R. Blakey, of Charlottesville, Va., writes us this graphic picture of a region where the Gospel is sadly needed:

I was born and reared in Piedmont, Va., and have spent my life there. I have had much to do with the Blue Ridge Mountain people during the last fifty years. There are good Christian people among them. But there are large districts, especially in the upper gorges and ridges, that are extremely poor and very wicked. They are strong and vigorous physically, and intellectually. But vice in multiplied form has characterized these people for generations. Churches have been organized along the base of the mountains, which have had and are having a happy effect upon the people who live along them, and upon a few of the people living higher up; and domestic missionaries have carried on a desultory war against the powers of darkness; but, nevertheless, this mountain population has remained the same, without material improvement. They have no social intercourse with the better people nearest to them. Much of the mountain land is poor, barren and rocky, and the people live in huts scattered thinly over the mountains. The children reared among them, under the examples of parents and associates, grow up to be as bad as their forefathers. It will not do to permit this state of affairs to continue indefinitely. What can be done?

Enquirer, ——. 1. What is the meaning of "forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors?" Are we to forgive every one who owes us, even if they are able to pay and will not; or is it not our duty to ourselves and others to enforce collections where the debtor is well able to pay and will not? 2. Is it wise or right for any young man to pay special attention to any young lady when he has no prospect in sight of income enough to support a wife? Would it not be better and wiser to steer clear from possible entanglements until he has income enough to provide all necessities and some comforts? 3. Is not thirty years of age young enough to marry if circumstances do not permit before?

1. The words are to be construed in a broad and liberal sense. It is not implied that we are to waive our claim to repayment of just obligations, but to forgive where such payment is impossible; not to be vindictive; to forgive equally a debt, a trespass, an offence, as we look to God for forgiveness of the debts or duties we have neglected, and the trespasses and offences we have committed against his holy law. 2. Love frequently overlooks such difficulties, but it is well for a young man to have some certain means of livelihood or income before he proposes marriage, otherwise he may soon realize the truth of the old adage, "When poverty comes in at the door, love flies out of the window." 3. It depends wholly on the circumstances of the case.

Subscriber, ——. 1. Who are the Copts? 2. What is their faith and what book of belief do they use?

1. The Copts are a denomination of Christians known as Monophysites—a sect which originated in the year 451 A. D. Some writers derive the name from Coptos, once a great city in upper Egypt, but the best authorities hold that the native Christians of Egypt, as a class, chose the name of Copts when the division occurred in the early Christian Church which resulted in their practical separation from the ecclesiastical court at Constantinople. Their ancestors intermarried with Greeks, Nubians and Abyssinians, so that they are a mixed race. 2. They hold seven sacraments, believe in trine immersion and celebrate the Lord's Supper. Their general religious observances in many respects conform to those of the Greek Church and their three liturgies have been translated from the original Greek. They have the Coptic version of the Scriptures, but it is not in the hands of the people. As their ceremonies conform to their liturgical books and their services conform to David's resolution (Psalm 119: 164) more rigidly than any other Christian sect.

H. C. P., Norfolk, Va. What is the meaning of the phrase Jonah 3: 10, God repented of the evil which he said he would do?

In speaking of God, the Bible writers use the language of men to make themselves understood. The phrase simply means that he refrained from inflicting the punishment he had threatened. The people of Nineveh repented and humbled themselves, and God mercifully withheld the judgments that he had pronounced upon them.

Edward Wright, Chicago, Ill. Am I right in declaring that a man who believes in evolution is and cannot be a Christian?

No, there are very sincere Christians who believe in evolution, some of them earnest ministers. There are comparatively few evolutionists who hold that evolution accounts for the origin of all matter and for life. They hold that evolution is God's way of working, proceeding from lower to higher forms of life. Many regard the beginning of the human race as a distinct creative act, when by imparting new life Adam "became a living soul." (See Gen. 2: 7.)

G. H. C., Page, Neb. Is not sin the same in every one? A man here says that what would be sin in him is not sin in me.

Probably the man was referring to such questionable matters as those of which Paul writes in Romans 14, which come up in every generation. In his day the chief was eating of meat that might have been offered in sacrifice to idols. Paul's rule applies now. If a man's conscience condemns an act, and he, nevertheless, commits it, he sins. But if another man thinks it is right, and commits it, he does not sin. This, of course, applies only to those doubtful matters, and not to those explicitly forbidden.

J. A. Bissell, Pine City, Wash. Is there any way of being sure what parts of the Bible are intended for everyone and what parts for the Jews only?

The same question was raised in Apostolic days, and a Council was called to decide it. You will find the decision in Acts 15: 23-29. The Mosaic laws relating to food, to the feasts and fasts, and other matters, were not, as you will see, considered binding on Christians. The laws applying to the Jews as a nation were thus abrogated. But such books as the Psalms and the Prophecies contain teaching of the most value. The New Testament of course is of universal application.

S. A. D., ——. Was Christ's resurrection a resurrection of his natural body? If so, how are we to understand the statement that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God (1. Cor. 15:

The statement is made by Paul in his argument for the resurrection, and he proceeds to state in the next verse that the living will be changed without dying, implying that in other cases the change is worked at death. The change, whatever it may be, may have been worked on Christ's body at his death. The plain language of the evangelists has no other meaning than that it was his actual body that rose. They saw the wounds in his hands and side. But it was changed from the ordinary body, in that it appeared and vanished at will and entered the room, "the door being shut."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

MADAGASCAR'S PLIGHT.

APPEALS from the commander of the French expedition in Madagascar, to his government, for reinforcements are becoming urgent. It is evident that the climate is proving a more formidable enemy than the Queen's army. The Queen's public prayer for divine aid in resisting the cowardly invaders would appear to have been heard. The season has been exceptionally rainy, and rain in Madagascar means difficulty of transportation and danger of fever and dysentery. Letters from correspondents of the French papers state that two-thirds of the soldiers landed have been sick and the proportion of deaths was very high. Nevertheless, Gen. Duchesne is steadily pushing forward toward the capital. He is, as far as possible, using the rivers for transportation to avoid the moist ground, over which it is difficult to drag his artillery. A number of shallow boats have been constructed and some powerful little tugs are used to take them up the rivers. From the boats it is possible to shell the mud fortresses of the Malagasy, as in the instance of Marovoav, the attack on which is the subject of the illustration on this page. The Malagasy garrisons appear to be astounded at the distance the French guns will reach. The most ominous news yet received is that the husband of the Queen, who is Prime Minister, has a rooted conviction that the French will never reach the capital and opposes the measures of defence that the Queen was advised to adopt. He insists that they are unnecessary and work upon them was stopped by his orders. Col. Shervington, the English officer in command after vainly endeavoring to obtain authority to proceed with the works, resigned the command and his example was followed by other European officers. The Malagasy government will now be left to its own resources and it appears to have no adequate idea of the peril by which it is menaced. To add to the miseries of the situation, there is good ground for suspecting treason in the party that has the ear of the Queen. It is believed that influential men have made terms with the French on their own account and are using their influence with the Queen for her destruction. It is certain that opportunities for checking the French advance, which might have been used effectively by troops acquainted with the conformation of the country, have been neglected, and it is charged that there was a corrupt motive motive for the neglect. The French are also receiving aid from the Sakalavas, the hereditary foes of the Hova dynasty. There is no moral justification for the unprovoked attack of the French on Madagascar. It is an act of wanton aggression by a strong nation on a weak one. The Queen and her people are learning by sad experience the lesson which is too often forgotten by nations as by individuals that neither learning nor culture is sufficient without religion to restrain men from wrongdoing and the disregard of others' rights.

Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people. Prov. 14: 34.

Concealed under Flowers.

United States detectives made a strange discovery in Brooklyn last week. A large number of spurious half dollars have been in circulation lately, and there were reasons for believing that at least some of them were made in Brooklyn, but the counterfeiters and their place of work could not be found. One day last week, however, a clue was furnished. A quiet, apparently respectable man and his wife who lived in a flat, fell under suspicion. Their apartments were searched, but there were no signs of unlawful occupation. The police, however, believed that the couple were members of the counterfeiting gang and decided in the assistance of United States detectives. Another search of the apartments was made. Everything in the rooms was examined, but there was no trace of crime. The furniture and articles around indicated that the occupants lived a quiet, inoffensive life. They appeared to be fond of flowers, for a number of boxes, in which plants were growing, stood on the roof of an extension outside their windows. Even these the detectives regarded with suspicion, and their suspicions were justified. The boxes had false bottoms, and in them were concealed under the soil the tools of their fraudulent occupation. A melting pot with cold metal still in it, phials containing acids and other incriminating article were found, with the plants growing above them. The same principle of concealment is often adopted to disarm suspicion. The church frequently falls under reproach through wicked men making profession of religion to hide their evil deeds.

Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. II. Cor. 11: 14.

A Lawyer Held for Ransom.

A bold crime was perpetrated in Buffalo, N. Y., recently. A lawyer in that city received a letter asking him to negotiate the sale of a house. Shortly afterwards, a tall stranger drove to his home and asked him to go with him to inspect the house. The lawyer complied, and on reaching the house, which was apparently unoccupied, entered it without suspicion. He was no sooner inside than he was seized and gagged and carried into the cellar, where preparations had been made to secure him. Fetters were placed on his wrists and ankles, and he was chained to the wall. He was informed that he would be released only on the payment of a large sum of money. Under the terror of his situation, he signed a promissory note, which, in a letter he wrote to his wife, he directed her to get discounted, and this was carried to his family. They were assured that unless the money was paid, the lawyer would pay the penalty with his life. The family notified the police, and after forty-eight hours' confinement in the cellar, the lawyer was found and released. No arrests were made, but it is reported that the abductors had formerly been clients of the lawyer, for whom he had conducted business which had not terminated to their satisfaction. The abduction was planned to compel him to return the fees he had received in the case. Large sums have frequently been secured by brigands in Europe in that way, but no one supposed such a crime could be perpetrated in an American city. The abductors evidently believed Satan's dictum that "All that a man hath will he give for his life." Most men, in like circumstances, would have yielded as the lawyer did. It is a pity that when eternal life is in question, men who are bound by the chain of their sins are seldom so ready to make sacrifices, to obtain deliverance, when those sacrifices involve the struggle with some enslaving habit, or the surrender of some acquaintance whose influence is pernicious. Yet we have the Divine assurance that

It is better to enter into life maimed, than having two hands to go into hell (Mark 9. 43).

FRENCH GUNBOATS BOMBARDING THE FORT OF MAROVOAV.

To Exterminate Mosquitoes.

An interesting experiment is being made in a Long Island summer resort. A clergyman has been making a study of the habits of the mosquito, the neighborhood being an unpleasantly favorable locality for the investigation. He has also had a long correspondence with the Department of Agriculture at Washington with the object of obtaining all available knowledge of the pest. He came to the conclusion that there was a three weeks' interval between the hatching or the swarms and that the favorite places for the operation were the marshes and fresh-water ponds. After several tests, he selected kerosene-oil as the most effective exterminator. With a can of the oil he visited each pond and marsh in the neighborhood and poured a small quantity in the water and sprayed it over the marshes. The result is a marked diminution in the number of mosquitoes and the clergyman thinks that those which are still flying around belong to earlier swarms. He is sanguine of entirely exterminating the pest by continuing his kerosene treatment, which, he is firmly convinced, will prevent the mosquitoes coming to life. Perhaps the time will come when men at the head of our governments and social reformers will act on a similar principle. We should not need near so many penitentiaries and reformatories as we now do if we could reach the places out of which criminals come. The saloon, the gambling house, and the miserable social conditions of the poor are the places where the antidote to evil needs to be applied. In spiritual matters the same law of dealing with evil at its source was laid down by Christ.

Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, thefts, false witness, &c. (Matt. 15: 19.)

A Blind Executrix.

The Register of a Philadelphia court decided a remarkable application a few days ago. The heirs of a recently deceased citizen opposed probate of his will on the ground that a lady whom he had appointed executrix of his will was incompetent owing to blindness. The Register examined the lady, and though there was no doubt as to her blindness, he dismissed the objection and confirmed her appointment. Evidence had been presented to him proving that the lady had abundant business qualifications, and that she had already served in the same capacity in her father's case. He had been the principal owner of a Passenger Railway line, and large interests had been involved in the administration of his will, which the blind lady had managed with remarkable ability, to the perfect satisfaction of all concerned. The Register appears to have thought that integrity and business capacity were the chief requisites for the duties of the position, and as those were proved, the defect of blindness was not important. It is so in spiritual matters. There are many Christians whose defects in education and worldly wisdom cause them to be despised, but if they have faith they have that which is essential,

For we walk by faith, not by sight (II. Cor. 5. 7).

BRIEF NOTES.

In California there are four Japanese Churches, including [illegible] with 145 members, and in Sunday Schools 544, with a contribution of $3,323.

Rev. Dr. MacArthur preached in Salt Lake City, Sunday morning, June 9, and addressed a large Sunday School meeting in the evening. He sailed on June 15 from San Francisco for Honolulu.

Mr. E. J. Glave, one of Mr. H. M. Stanley's junior officers in his African explorations, recently died at the mission station, Underhill, on the Congo. He had crossed Africa from Zanzibar to the Congo.

His Majesty the King of Sweden Laid the foundation-stone recently of the fine building in course of erection for the Stockholm Young Men's Christian Association.

A Montreal Court Has Just Decided that the name of "Methodist" applied by one editor to another is an opprobrious epithet, and has fined the one who used it two hundred dollars.

Dr. Joseph Cook reached San Francisco on his trip around the world, June 6. He spoke on the succeeding Sunday evening in the First Church, and many could not find admittance. His theme was The Signs of the Times.

In Connection with the Vote by which the recent convention of the chiefs of police of the United States and Canada created the office of chaplain, Chief Harrigan, of St. Louis, remarked: "A man who doesn't believe in God ought not to be on the police force."

Rev. E. P. Hammond's book, the "Conversion of Children," has been translated into the Tamil language, which is spoken by 15,000,000 in Southern India, and has also been translated into the Norwegian and other languages.

There is on Exhibition in London a Sabbath-keeping clock, made in Scotland. It stops working from twelve o'clock on Saturday night till twelve on Sunday night, and directly the hands stop, there appear on the face of the clock the words, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy."

Major D. W. Whittle has been Holding united services at Holland, Mich. For three weeks meetings were held nightly, and the last two Sundays, the Major addressed a crowded house of women in the afternoon, and a similar meeting of men in the evening.

Rev. C. H. Perren's Services in the First Baptist Church, of St. Paul, Minn., have been widely blessed. There was a keen interest from the first, deepening as the services continued. The additions to the Church already exceed one hundred, and there are many anxious inquirers.

Dr. Fairbairn, the President of Mansfield College, Oxford, who recently lectured here, has a class [illegible]. His address was attended by a Japanese, a lady professor from the American Girls' College at Constantinople, a Roman Catholic priest from St. Paul, Minn., and a graduate of the University of Chicago.

We Grieve to Learn that Philip Phillips, the Singing Pilgrim, died on June 25. The whole Church of Christ loses in him an earnest worker, and one whose tuneful voice has drawn many wanderers to the fold, and inspired other workers with new energy and courage. His portrait and a sketch of his eventful life appeared in this journal on June 26.

Rev. R. G. Pearson's meetings at Nashville have closed amid general rejoicing. Five churches united in the work and there has been a great harvest of souls. A conspicuous feature of the movement was the number of Christian people who confessed that they had been cold and listless in Christ's service, and who renewed their vows of consecration and service.

A Sad Letter appeared in The London Times recently about the rum traffic in West Africa from Bishop Tugwell, who says: "Gin and rum are being poured into the country in appalling quantities, and that almost without let or hindrance. The advance of the natives in civilization has been wholly checked by this abominable traffic. Whatever may be the case in Europe, in Africa spirits are the destruction of the black man, body and soul."

The Seventh Annual Seaside Conference for Bible study, conducted by Dr. L. W. Munhall, will be held in Educational Hall, Asbury Park, N. J., July 19-29 inclusive. The teachers this year will be (D. V. Bishop William Taylor, of Africa; Professors L. T. Townsend, J. M. Stiffler, Wm. G. Moorehead, and Ernest F. Stroeter; Doctors S. L. Baldwin, William J. and Albert Erdman, and Robert Cameron; Rev. A. C. Dixon, I. C. Scofield, Cornelius Wolfkin, W. W. Clark, and William Needham; Evangelists D. W. Whittle and Thomas Needham; and Mr. F. S. Brockton. The Conference sessions are free to all.

The Census Report Just Issued from the Census Bureau gives interesting statistics of the religious denominations. It appears that there are 142 distinct religious organizations in the United States, besides independent churches and miscellaneous congregations. The total of communicants of all denominations is 21,212,807, who belong to 165,177 organizations or congregations. These congregations have 142,521 edifices, which have sittings for 43,564,863 persons. The value of all church property used exclusively for purposes of worship is $679,630,139. There are 111,036 regular ministers, not including lay preachers.

The Fact Mentioned in this Column last week that the Japanese Christians had decided to dispense with the support of the American Board has caused some concern. It has been decided to send a commission to Japan to ascertain what provisions are being made for aggressive work, and whether it will be advisable to withdraw the Missionaries of the Board now in Japan. The deputation consists of the Hon. William P. Ellison, of the Prudential Committee, the Rev. James L. Barton, one of the Foreign Secretaries of the Board; the Rev. James G. Johnson, Chicago, and the Rev. A. H. Bradford, of Montclair. The report of this Commission will be awaited with [illegible] by the members of the Congregational Church in the United States, the sum [illegible] $[illegible],000 a year has been devoted to missions in Japan.

SILHOUETTES FROM LIFE

WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BY

Margaret E. Sangster.

BEHIND CLOSED DOORS.

WHEN I knew them first, the Maitlands had lived many years behind closed doors, as jealously secluded from intercourse with the townspeople and the public generally, as ever was an Oriental family in harem. There were only women in the house, a mother and four daughters. In the early morning, and in the evening dusk the former slipped out to do the necessary errands, but one seldom saw her at noonday, or in the crowds; she was the single attendant from her home at church services, where she always sat with a thick veil down, screening her face, and occupied a seat close to the entrance, and whence she flitted away, the instant the benediction was pronounced.

This mother was an old and feeble woman when I made her acquaintance, and it was by means of an accident that the pleasure befell me, for a pleasure it speedily grew to be. Thirty-five years had crept, shadow and shine, shine and shadow, over the dial plate of the skies, since with her girls, young then, she had deliberately decided that the life of a recluse would be best for her and for them.

It was not a novel story, that of the thing that had struck them like lightning, blotting out the light of heaven from their hearts, and clouding their paths thenceforward with an enfolding gloom. The only son of the house, their pride and hope, a gay merry-hearted lad, popular and charming in society, had yielded to temptation and embezzled a large sum of money, so large that the stricken women were horrified at the mere sound of the sum total. But, honest to the core, and proud of their unstained name, they would have been not less dismayed and humiliated, had the theft been of a few dollars only, and not of thousands. The iron of shame entered into their very souls, and when the absconding debtor and defaulter fled to some far-away hiding-place in South America, or Asia, nobody had ever known just where, his mother and sisters hid themselves in their home, and simply burrowed there.

The day I first penetrated the guarded Maitland gate, was a fateful one in their history. I had gone to the post-office for my mail; it was at twilight, and a line of people were waiting for letters. Mrs. Maitland, a straight, spare, slender figure, black-robed and veiled, was just in front of me, and as she received her mail, she stepped out of the line, and glancing over the budget which had been handed her, wavered, with sudden faintness, under the smoky, flaring lamp. I caught and steadied her, and, perceiving that she was too weak to walk alone, said in a matter-of-course manner:

"We go in the same direction. Let me help you to your door."

The faintness returned once and again, and by the time we had reached her home, I had to assist Mrs. Maitland in. In the moonlit evening we opened the door in the brick wall and passed between two tall borders of thick-growing box, to that of the house. Four elderly ladies, all trim, slender, and with the curious look of unworldliness and childishness often seen in the faces of those who have lived in communities apart from the world, followed in the wake of the negro Mammy who shuffled up to answer my knock.

[illegible] enough to tell the [illegible] and then I [illegible] and went home. I left the [illegible] Mammy who brought the message, said pleadingly, "Mis' Margaret done obercome at las'!" The young ladies don't know [illegible]

Miss Margaret [illegible] affectionately gave Mrs. Maitland, as she always had done from youth up. I needed no second invitation, but hurrying over the little space between our houses, found Agnes, Henrietta, Luella and Antoinette, gentle, sweet, flower-like, and helpless, hovering around their mother, who waved them all aside, and asked me, a stranger, to listen to her confidence, and give her my advice.

"My dear," she said, looking up from the pillows of her couch, "I had a shock last night. A postmark, a hand I knew, it came suddenly—one who was dead is alive again, I have not told the girls. They think their brother died years ago. I don't know what to do! He is my boy, my son, my baby that I rocked in my arms. He comes back now, because it is safe for him, and I —I am his mother—I love him yet; but, I am not glad, I cannot be glad!

"The money—is paid—" she went on in gasps, "was paid—long ago. We saved it, cent by cent. We starved to pay it, we sold everything except this home. Now, Ferdinand is on his way here, and the girls don't know, and I cannot tell them. God help me! Life is hard!"

"Yes, poor lady, life is hard," I thought, "you never said a truer word. Hard for the sinner, hard for his friends, hardest of all for those who go away, and coming home find their places filled.

"The only thing, dear Mrs. Maitland," I said aloud, "is to tell your daughters at once. Your son has been in a far country. His sisters will be ready to welcome him home. Blood is thicker than water, and one's heart stirs at the thought of a kindred heart-beat, at the ring of a brother's step. Do not be afraid, tell them to-day!"

Even while I spoke there was a commotion at the front door, and without preamble or anouncement of any sort, a tall fresh-colored man walked in, his eyes confident and bright, his bearing breezily eager, his whole air that of a prosperous citizen of the world, with nothing to dash his pleasure.

"Mother!" he said, "Here I am, your bad penny back on your hands. Girls, Luella, Toinette, — Agnes, Henny, you haven't forgotten Fred, I hope?"

Nobody spoke, but the mother cried and held out her arms.

Truly, this was an assured and unrepentant prodigal. I got myself away, the only decent thing to do being to leave the family—alone, but as I went I had a glimpse of Agnes looking white and stern, Luella tremulous, Henrietta wistful, and Toinette, the youngest, absolutely radiant. And the mother's arms were around her big son's neck.

I doubt whether Ferdinand Maitland had ever felt the full enormity of his offense against honor and God. At all events, he returned to a town which had forgotten him and his misdeeds, and in which few people knew the old story, or cared about the hermit-life which the humbled women of the Maitland household had passed for years.

Laughing off Agnes's severity, accepting Toinette's instantly given devotion, Ferdinand Maitland was presently established as the head of the house. He had worked hard, and he brought home money; he had no vices, and he was wilful and masterful, like a man. The old house opened its doors. The family mingled again in the affairs of life. Bit by bit, the arrested development of the sisters yielded to outside influences, and they were seen here and there—they took an interest in what was going on; they ignored their own past. The prodigal son had put on the best robe, and thrown an end of it over his people.

Said Mrs. Maitland to me, one day:

"I don't understand Ferdinand. I pray for him even more now than I did when he first went away. So many years I left him in God's hands, when I thought him dead, I can but leave him still at the foot of the Cross, day by day, for I believe in covenant [illegible] and God [illegible] Ferdinand."

Her Earthly Mission Ended.

Grand Emily Faithfull's Life Serenely Closed—An Apostle of Woman's Work —Her Eventful Career.

LOOKING backward over the last half century, there are few more illustrious names among Christian women than that of Emily Faithfull, who passed away on May 31, at her home in Plymouth Grove, Manchester, England. Emily Faithfull was the youngest daughter of the Rev. Ferdinand Faithfull, who for nearly fifty years was Rector of Headley, Surrey, England, where she was born in 1835. She was presented at Court on her 21st birth-day, and within a few months of that event commenced the great work to which, as long as health permitted, she devoted her life. She soon wearied of the more frivolous amusements of London society; and, having diligently discharged for some months the duties of Secretary to the Society for Promoting the Employment of Women, became, at the suggestion of Lord Brougham and Lord Shaftesbury, the moving spirit of a committee of the Social Science Association formed with a similar object. Her essentially practical mind saw clearly that the true remedy for women's wrongs lay in enlarging their field of labor; and the wonderful amelioration in the condition of her poorer sisters which has taken place, both in this country and England, during the past forty years, has been measurably helped by her unceasing activity in the workshop, by lectures, and by literary work. Early in her career, Miss Faithfull started a printing office with female compositors, which proved to be anything but a rash experiment. Her name speedily became known throughout the length and breadth of England.

THE LATE MISS EMILY FAITHFULL.

In 1860 Miss Faithfull collected a band of women, and in spite of great difficulties founded the Victoria Press establishment in Great Coram street, London, in which these women were employed as compositors, and for which she obtained the approval of the Queen. The Victoria Press obtained quite a reputation for the excellence of its work. On one occasion Miss Faithfull said to an interviewer, "It was a proud moment when I found myself appointed 'Printer and Publisher in Ordinary to the Queen,' after doing some work which had given her Majesty great satisfaction." Through jealousy, aroused by the "innovation" of employing women, the machinery was wilfully injured again and again, and there was, consequently, a ruinous waste of capital, but Miss Faithfull persevered until trained women compositors could find employment in other establishments.

In order the better to propagate her views, in May, 1863, she commenced the publication of the "Victoria Magazine," in which she earnestly pleaded the claims of women to remunerative employment. The Empress Frederick headed its list of subscribers and Sir Edwin Arnold penned the dedication for the volume, which Miss Faithfull and other women printers presented to the Princess of Wales on her marriage.

Shortly after this she made her debut as a lecturer. In this character, and always with the same object in view, she achieved a marked success and appeared in the leading literary and philosophic institutions. In her first year she delighted London audiences with her lecture on "The Claims of Women," convincing her hearers that women are entitled to a fair chance of livelihood as well as to the advantage of higher education and the just protection of their own earnings.

Three lecture tours were made in the United States between 1872 and 18[illegible] in the interest of the work to which she had devoted herself. Upon her return from her last tour she published a book, entitled "Three Visits to America," in which she described with considerable power the conditions of various feminine industries. Upon her return to England, she took up her abode at Plymouth Grove, Manchester, where she passed the remainder of her life. A writer, speaking of her study as it appeared several years later, says: "Over the desk there hangs an engraved portrait of the Queen. The inscription, 'To [illegible] Faithfull, from Victoria R. and I., [illegible] commemorates the thirtieth year of her self-imposed labors in promoting the industrial and educational interests of women.

From her Plymouth Grove retreat [illegible] Faithfull for a long time past was a frequent contributor to many leading papers and magazines. Knowing her philanthropic nature, all suits and conditions of men and women persisted in consulting her, both personally and by letter, and the demands for financial aid were many, and rarely was a deserving case refused. She was an industrious worker and lecturer, but of late years asthma prevented her from frequently appearing on the platform. In 1884, English [illegible] men and writers, bishops, judges, peers and philanthropists, joined in a memorial, praying the First Lord of the Treasury to recommend the Queen to bestow a literary pension on Miss Faithfull, in consideration of her distinguished services during the last twenty-five years, both as a writer and a worker on behalf of the education and employment of women. A moderate grant was made from the Royal Bounty Fund in 188[illegible] and two years later she received a Civil Service pension. In September, 1890, she visited, by request, the Queen of Roumania, who was then in England, and detailed to her Majesty the various movements in women's work in England.

Miss Faithfull had in the course of her career the acquaintance and friendship of many noble and progressive women, who in Great Britain and America were striving for social amelioration, and especially of those who were seeking a wider outlet for the education and industrial activities of their sex. Her very presence and her power of acceptable speech were of great service in the pioneer deeds of this movement.

Miss Faithfull's voice was singularly soft and melodious, and even when suffering from illness she always had a friendly word and ready ear for those who sought her aid. The first fruits of her well-directed zeal have been to draw the rich and poor nearer to each other, and to bring social needs and those honestly endeavoring to remedy them face to face. In many [illegible] ways she has been a foremost worker for the best interests of her sex.

Miss Faithfull came of a race of country clergymen, and Christian character was with her almost an inheritance. Her grandfather was Rector of Warfield. Her uncle Francis was one of Lord William Cecil's predecessors at Hatfield, and her father was for nearly half a century the Rector of Headley, near Epsom, where she was born. The memory of her work for women will long be cherished by the Christian women of Europe and America, for her personality and influence were factors, in a moral and industrial sense, whose value cannot be overestimated. It is probable that the working women of England will rear a monument or erect a memorial of some enduring sort to this faithful and noble worker in their behalf.

A MOTHER'S CONVERSION.

MRS. D——, a lady in Garden City, Mo., sends us this most interesting experience:

"I want to tell you an incident of several years ago. A lady friend who had just passed through ght trouble, called to see me. She was sing a book of Dwight L. Moody's sermns. I put my name down on her list of sscribers. At that time my heart had nder known sorrow; however, God saw tl heavy cloud gathering over my defence-le head, and the angels covered me with tir wings. The doorbell rang, 'an the lady was told that I was in my room and indisposed. She w paid off and the book left o the parlor table. Several hrs after, as I passed through th house from room to room, g sping hold of first one piece of urniture, then another—for m head was whirling like a t the sudden news of father's a dent, the loss of my beautiful home, (a present from my pr ents), the great loss of mey—all broke in upon my so like a flood. I could not w without some kind of supp. Finally I wandered into th parlor. The piano was all out rung to my ears. I staggled over by the table and the was just what God, in lo had lain there for me, to br g back my reasoning powet I picked up the book and, in half-insane manner, turned th leaves. My eyes rested upo the beginning of a sermon, 'Gd is Love.' I said, 'Don't bieve it. I will see what he h to say.' And so I think if m heart had not found words of rest and solid comfort, I wld have been crazy. I put th words 'God is Love,' in la e letters on the wall, near m table in the dining-room. Ven the children saw what a onderful change had taken pl e they were surprised, for I h been so nervous that I could n bear them to come into my ro n, only one at a time, and th they must whisper.

"In the evening I threw open m shutters, and opened the pno, gathered my children and mher about me, and we all jed in singing, 'Praise God fm whom all blessings flow.' I ew my neighbor to my heart, a as I have moved from one pce to another, I draw sad hrts to me and over in the ighborhood, near Lee's Sumt, thirty miles away, I prested my Moody sermons to a dr neighbor who lost a son al she says, 'Oh, how could have borne my trouble if you H not been with me.'"

PRAYER IN A CRISIS.

A recent letter from Mr. W. J. Upcraft, who is laboring in Western China, contains the following: Living as we have one for the past six months at its the most westerly point occupied by evangelical missionaries in this great province of Sechuan, we have had occasion often to praise the name of our Lord for manifold grace bestowed in guidance, in protection, in supply, and still more for a readiness to hear on the part of the people in this large district. Yachow lies at the extreme western limit of navigation, of the great road that leads from Pekin to Tibet. At our first coming in the heat of the past summer, there was a manifest spirit of opposition, and the uncertain tenure seemed likely to end in our expulsion. On Saturday evening the crisis was reached, and three of us, two westerners and one Chinese, knelt in a darkened room in the new-rented house, to commend ourselves and the work to God's Almighty care, not knowing whither or what might next be. On Sunday the public recognition of the work by the highest Mandarin in the district allayed all opposition, and since then no hand has been raised against us.

Two visits to a point ten days' march further west than Yachow have laid a new district upon our hearts, and as soon as the point is occupied by workers already on their way, we shall be free to go on and seek an entrance there. Ta-chien-lu is the border town and point of entry for trade and travel between China and central Tibet. The home of Chinese traders; the great sea mart, from whence the tea is carried as far as Lhassa; the centre of a great number of Tibetan lamas, traders and farmers, this city offers especial advantages for a dual work—for the Chinese on the one hand, who are very friendly; for the Tibetans on the other, who may be reached in large numbers.

LAST SONG OF PHILIP PHILLIPS, WRITTEN APRIL 4, 1895.

PHILIP PHILLIPS' LAST SONG.

The beautiful hymn, "O Lord, Remember Me," which is published in Our Service of Song in the present issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, deserves to be cherished by all lovers of sacred music. It was written by Philip Phillips, "the Singing Pilgrim," while he lay in his last sickness and the proof of the composition was sent to him for revision. But his powers were already failing and he sent the music to Mr. Sankey, with a request that the latter should kindly perform for him the office of revision, which he was glad to be able to do.

THE USE OF PROPHECY.*

The Duty of Studying the Prophecies Incumbent on Intelligent Christians.

BY DEAN BAGOT.

THE Epistle which contains this important injunction was written by St. Peter a short time before his death, or to use his own words, recorded in the 14th verse, shortly before he was to put off the tabernacle of his body. It is therefore to be regarded as his dying charge to the Church of God. It was evidently intended for the whole Church in every place and in every age, for what language could be more general than the address in the first verse?—"Simon Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that have obtained like precious faith with us through the righteousness of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." His main object is to insist upon the necessity of progress in the Christian course, and of giving all diligence to acquire those graces which constitute the fruit of the Spirit, and which are the elements of that holiness without which no man can see the Lord.

To encourage the members of the Church in this grand pursuit he refers to the reality and certainty of the Second Advent of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ to establish his everlasting kingdom, into which, he says, that if they succeed, in thus making their calling and election sure, "an entrance shall be ministered unto them abundantly" (ver. 10, 11).

Now the Apostle does not allude to any one prophecy in particular, but to the whole expanse and field of prophecy referring to the Second Coming of Jesus Christ. I say to the Second Coming, not to the First, for those that relate to the First Coming had been fulfilled, and had, I may say, become history; but it is to prophecy as such that he here refers, or, as the 16th verse shows, to the testimony of prophecy to the coming of Christ in majesty and glory, which includes what was necessarily future at the time when St. Peter wrote. There are many persons who think that unfulfilled prophecy constitutes so difficult and dangerous a portion of Scripture that it should rather be avoided, lest those who would attempt to study it should wrest it to their own destruction. Others regard it as comparatively unimportant, and say that we should rather attend to the doctrinal and practical portions of the Word of God. And why, let me ask, why were the prophecies given? I verily believe that one of the leading sins of multitudes in the professing Church in our day is the neglect of prophecy. Let such persons attend to what occurs in the commencement of the most difficult prophetic book of Scripture, "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those are written therein" (Rev. 1:3). In fact, those who neglect prophecy have only a mutilated Gospel, or half a Gospel, for the Gospel treats not only of the sufferings of Christ, but also of the glory that should follow; not only of Christ on the cross, but also of Christ on the throne; not only of Christ as the Man of Sorrows, but also of Christ as King of kings and Lord of lords; not only of the First Advent, but also of the Second. Such persons lose half the instruction, half the motives, and half the comfort which God has provided for His people.

*Referring in his second Epistle, to the prophecies the Apostle Peter 1. 19-21 likens them to a lamp shining in a dark place to which he said his readers would do well to give heed.

A CLEAN LIFE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing July 21. Psalm 119: 9-16.

WE have been so effusive in our welcome of the great sinner who has quitted his ways and turned to the Lord, that there has arisen a danger of young men thinking that there is a peculiar value and dignity attaching to the prodigal. We would not change our way in spite of the danger, nor abate by one whit the cordiality of our welcome, for it is meet that we be glad when he that was dead is alive again, and he that was lost is found. But the danger is, nevertheless, a real one and it is increased by the current opinion in society that it is manly to indulge in sin. The sneers worldlings keep for the good young man, their epithets of milksop and similar contemptuous names have been weighty forces in dragging down many a young man into vicious ways. Everything seems to combine to make the downward path easy and attractive, and as the young man is drawn toward it by the impulses of his own nature and the temptations around him, he is liable to be influenced by the specious argument that when he repents and reforms—as of course he means to do—there will be great rejoicing over him, more than if he had never gone astray. It is therefore important to emphasize by every means the fact that sin is always loss, that over and above its guilt, it is detriment and demoralizaion. It taints, maims, and dwarfs the nature of any man who falls into it, and leaves him a poorer, weaker, worse man in every way. Through the mercy of God its guilt is removed and the sinner becomes the child of God, but it is in spite of his sin and not because of it.

The question of the Psalmist, therefore, is the most important any young man can ask at the opening of his active career: Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? He can acquire no knowledge so precious as that. If he can have a clean way, a pure life, he is a better man and more enviable in the end than if he had riches and honors. And the form of the question is an intimation of the kind of danger that besets him.

The way needs cleansing. His feet will inevitably go near the mire. That it shall not pollute him and shall not adhere to him is the utmost he can hope. He must take heed thereto, the Psalmist tells him. There must be active vigilance. Mere passivity is not sufficient. He who would keep the evil out of his heart, even in imagination, must be continually on guard. Like the ground, it will produce noxious weeds without any sowing. The animal nature with which the spiritual is so intimately associated, will gain the predominance if it be not rigorously held under. Woe to the young man whose life is ruled by his body, who is forced to gratify its appetites and desires against the protest of his spirit and conscience. That is the worst kind of anarchy. The dethroned sovereign of his nature may regain its rightful place, but it will be only after a painful and protracted struggle which ought never to have been necessary. Happy and blessed is he who is spared that conflict by a steady maintenance of order and purity in his life from the start and a rigorous subjection of the rebellious passions which enslave and debase.

THE TENEMENT HOUSE CHAPTER.

We are asked to remind King's Daughters who read this page, of the needs of the Chapter that works among the tenements of New York. This Chapter, while doing a most important work among the poor of the East side of the city, has of late been sadly crippled for money. The Mizpah Christmas Circle of New York has become interested in it and is anxious to start a subscription list for it among the Circles. They head this list with $10.00.

The Tenement House Chapter was organized to represent The Order of the King's Daughters in Tenement House Work, in New York; and it naturally looks to the Order for support. Circles at a distance which would gladly help in the actual work of the Chapter if they were nearer, can, by adding their name to this subscription list, have a personal interest in all that goes on, and will feel when they read of the Clubs, the Fresh Air Work, the Nursing and the Flower Mission, that a certain part of it has been their own work. Subscriptions should be sent to Miss Charlotte A. Waterbury, 77 Madison street, New York, from whom also any desired information may be obtained.

THE BOSTON CONVENTION.

The date of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the day set for the opening of the great International, Inter-denominational Christian Endeavor Convention in Boston, Mass., the Fourteenth of its line. Our readers know well what that means. Thousands of them can bear witness to the wonderful stimulus, the glorious access of spiritual energy that former conventions have imparted. The Fourteenth Convention is not likely to fall behind its predecessors. Dr. Clark says: "Our fellowship has increased all the world around as never before in all the fourteen years of our history. In many new countries—notably in Germany, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden and Holland—the work has been started, and the Constitution has been translated into a number of additional languages in many lands." Representatives from the greater number of these are expected to be present at this Convention, and will take part in the proceedings.

In point of numbers it is difficult to see how the record of 1894 can be beaten. Yet the growth hitherto from year to year would lead us to anticipate an advance even on the enormous figures of 1894. The Convention of that year which was held at Cleveland, O., numbered nearly 40,000. The first Convention at Portland, Me., in 1882, numbered 200. The rate of progression, therefore, can be easily calculated.

On this page is a picture of Mechanics' Building, the main auditorium of the Convention, and with it the latest portrait of the President of the United Society, Dr. F. E. Clark, who has so changed his appearance by the use of the razor as to be scarcely recognizable to friends who have not seen him for a year or two. From a gentleman who has access to reliable information, we have received the following hints of the characteristics of the great meeting which is to continue until Monday evening next:

The wonderful nature of the Boston Convention may be somewhat understood from the fact that no less than 250 meetings will be held during the five days, and more than 1,000 addresses will be delivered. Only a small portion of these will be in Mechanics' Hall and in the two mammoth tents on Boston Common. The committee conferences, sunrise prayer meeting, State and denominational rallies, will bring up the numbers.

The excellent balance that has been maintained in arranging for all the meetings of the Boston Convention is shown by a glance at the programme for Thursday night. In the Hall, Mr. Moody speaks; in Tent Williston, Dr. Talmage is to be heard; and in Tent Endeavor, Mr. John G. Woolley will occupy the platform.

The universal scope of the Christian Endeavor Society will be strikingly manifested at the Friday night session of the Boston Convention, when representatives from seventeen different countries will deliver addresses. This is to be "Fellowship Night."

PRESIDENT DR. F. E. CLARK.

With all the "Advances," the Convention has not overlooked the matter of music. Besides the vocalists, whose names are not yet announced, the famous Park Sisters, of New York, will play the cornet. The Park Sisters have carried past conventions by storm, and all four of them will be at Boston,. Three especially able musical directors have been secured, Mr. George C. Stebbins, Brooklyn, N. Y., Mr. Percy L. Foster, Washington, D. C., and Mr. L. F. Lindsay, St. Louis, Mo.

Arrangements have been made whereby the delegates will go out, in groups of twenty or thereabouts, and conduct devotional prayer meetings in a number of the stores, shops, and factories of Boston, with a view to presenting the glory of "Christ and him crucfied" to those to whom he is a stranger. The services will be carefully arranged in advance, so that with all the thoroughness and precision of a military movement this gospel campaign may cover the city. Mr. Dwight L. Moody, Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., Rev. James L. Hill, D.D., Rev. Charles Rhodes, Philadelphia, Penn., Rev. Chas. L. Oliver, York, Penn., Rev. Francis E. Smiley, Denver, Col., and Mr. C. N. Hunt., Minneapolis, Minn., will have the general charge of these meetings.

One conspicuous change in the Christian Endeavor Convention programme, is that which does away with all Sunday services, thereby rendering Sunday travel unnecessary. This is only one of the many departures that have been made in the Boston Convention from the custom of previous years.

A peculiar feature of the Convention, the like of which has probably never before been witnessed anywhere, will be a remarkable patriotic demonstration on Boston Common, on Saturday afternoon, July 13. The delegates will assemble from each of the three immense auditoriums (and fully fifty thousand delegates are expected), and will march from Mechanics' Hall to Boston Common, where a monster mass meeting will be held. The Governor of the State will deliver an address, and Dr. S. F. Smith, the author of "America," will sing his hymn. And, by the way, Dr. Smith is to write a special Convention hymn for this gathering. A number of prominent reformers will deliver addresses of a citizenship nature, and a chorus of a thousand voices, augmented by an immense orchestra, will sing patriotic songs.

There will be a unique souvenir of this occasion distributed among the delegates. It is a beautifully illuminated card, containing the hymn, "America," and a number of emblematic designs. A thousand copies of this card have been presented to the Boston Committee by Miss Helen M. Cougar, who originally designed the card made for private distribution among her friends.

The missionary interest of the Convention will be very great. This will be one of the leading features of the meeting. More missionaries from foreign lands will have ever before addressed a Christian Endeavor Convention will be present in Boston, and a number of the leaders of missionary thought in the evangelical denominations of our land will make addresses. One entire session both the hall and the two tents will be devoted to the general theme of "The World for Christ." The missionary rally on Saturday afternoon promises to be an exceptionally valuable service for those interested in the subject of missions in a practical way. Thursday afternoon will be given over wholly to meetings of the denominational clans, and hints from the leaders indicate that the rallies will be rich in practical results.

The Homes of Damascus.

Some of the Curious Things to be Seen in One of the Oldest Cities in the World.

NOWHERE in the East are there more attractions for the observant and thoughtful traveler than in the ancient city of Damascus. Its quaint buildings, but little changed in the style of their architecture since the days of the patriarchs; its gaily-turbaned men and veiled women; its numerous camels and donkeys; the ever-teeming bazaars and dingy low-ceiled cafes; the shops at whose doors sit the workers in silver and brass and all artistic metals: the silk merchants, carpet-vendors, and dealers in antique taste: the fruit-sellers with their baskets, and the ubiquitous water-carriers all attract the attention and excite the senses. One of these characteristic scenes—a bazaar exclusively occupied by workers in metal, chasers and engravers — is presented in the photograph on this page. The low, panelled doors, and overhanging, latticed windows, the artificers plying their trade outside the open court, and the mingled display of metal jars, inlaid tables, brass lamps, and other articles, piled in apparent confusion, combine to make a picture of industrial activity such as can be found in the East alone.

There are a thousand and one objects of interest in Damascus to be viewed by the tourist. These include the traditional house of Ananias, in which Paul was received after being Divinely smitten with temporary blindness; the great Mohammedan mosque once a Christian church, in which there is a tomb that is said to contain the head of John the Baptist; the place where Naaman, the great Syrian commander-in-chief, deposited the holy soil which he brought back with him when he returned from his visit to the Jordan, clean and whole; the famous "street called Straight," and the great Khans, where travelers from distant parts of the East lodge, with their animals. There are, besides, the booksellers' bazaar where only Mohammedan books are sold, and the bazaars of the boot and saddlers, of the coppersmiths, of the confectioners, (where the famous Damascus fruits are on sale), of the Persians, where pieces of printed goods and carpets are on exhibition; the Jewish Quarter, Saladin's Tomb, Naaman's House, and the Mausoleum of Fatima the Beautiful, daughter of the Prophet. At every step one is reminded that the great age of the city, which is said to have been founded by Uz, the grandson of Noah. Its streets may have been trodden by Abraham. It was here, too, in the synagogue which has long since disappeared that Paul first preached Christ, after his miraculous conversion.

From the hotel where strangers usually lodge the guest can hear the murmur and splash of the Abana, while not far distant is the greater river, the Pharpar. Filthy beyond description as to its streets, Damascus, its environs, is almost a paradise, for the abundant drainage of the two rivers has made the soil rich in verdure, and every species of tropical plant-life, while beyond, stretching to all points of the compass, lies the parched, barren desert.

As in all Eastern cities, the home-life of Damascus is hidden from the public gaze. The eye may not penetrate those walls of heavy whitish-gray stone; but if one is privileged to enter as a guest, the attractions of a Damascene interior may be seen. Some of the houses—nearly all of which have ample court-yards—are rich in decoration, as to walls, ceilings and floors, and the mosaic work and carvings found in many mansions would delight an art connoisseur. The women pass their time either indoors, or in the courts or gardens attached, making occasional visits to the bazaars, the mosques, and the baths, and being at such times attended by a servant and closely veiled. Their lives, with few exceptions, are those of menials or petted dependants, with few opportunities for mental improvement or social relaxation, as it is understood in the Western world. With respect to their religious belief, the population is overwhelmingly Mohammedan, and the muezzins, or officers of religion, call the people to prayer five times a day. Damascus contains probably 15,000 Christians, to 130,000 followers of the Prophet.

A BRASS WORKERS' BAZAAR IN DAMASCUS.

"From a photograph brought from the East by the Proprietor of The Christian Herald."

On a Mohammedan mosque in Damascus, unnoted probably for centuries, there was recently discovered an inscription in ancient Greek characters, which read: "Thy kingdom, oh Christ, is an everlasting kingdom." It is believed to have been engraved by the Crusaders. The inscription is prophetic, for it fortells the future not of Damascus only, but of the entire Moslem world, which is ultimately to be converted to Jesus. The time will yet come, when Damascus will be redeemed, and the city of the patriarchs will yet be possessed by a people who render a loving allegiance to the Saviour of men and live at peace with all the world. In those days, Damascus will again be an Oriental centre of energy and enterprise, of far-reaching industries and happy, prosperous homes.

Thoughtful Courtesy.

In training a child to courtesy, it is of little use to tell him to be forgetful of himself; but it is of value to tell him to be thoughtful of others. The more a person tries to forget himself, the surer he will be to think of himself. Often, indeed, it is the very effort of a person to forget himself, that makes that person painfully self-conscious, and causes him to seem bashful and embarrassed. But when a child thinks of others, his thoughts go away from himself, and self-forgetfulness is a result, rather than a cause, of his action.

In order to be courteous, a child must have a care to give due deference to others, in his ordinary salutations and greetings, and in his expression of thanks for every kindness or attention shown to him. So far most parents, who give any thought to a matter like this, are ready to go. But true courtesy includes a great deal more than this; and a child needs training accordingly.

Never too Young to Love Christ.

Rev. Dr. Judson relates this incident, illustrative of the duty of parents to draw their children's hearts to Jesus:

"Mother," a little child once said, "how old must I be before I can be a Christian?" The wise mother answered: "How old will you have to be, darling, before you can love me?" "Why, mother, I always loved you, I do now, and I always shall; but you have not told me yet how old I shall have to be." The mother replied: "How old must you be before you can trust yourself at all times wholly to me and my care?" "I always did," she answered; "but tell me what I want to know." And she put her arms around her mother's neck. The mother asked again: "How old will you have to be before you can do what I want you to do?"

Then the child whispered, half guessing what her mother meant: "I can now, without growing any older." Her mother said: "You can be a Christian now, darling, without waiting to be older. Don't you want to begin now?" The child whispered: "Yes." And in this simple fashion the greatest of lessons was learned.

An Imperial Housekeeper.

The Empress of Germany, like all German girls, was brought up to be a practical housekeeper, and it is the Emperor's boast that she can make pastry better than any of his cooks. To the Emperor she has been a devoted wife, and one of his noblest traits is his almost reverent affection for his consort. "I am never so happy," he says, "as when I dine at home alone with my wife." Her children are equally fond of her. She settles all disputes, and they always expect that, before retiring, "mother shall kiss them good night."

THE LORD BOWS DOWN.

OH, the Lord bows down to listen,
And the kingly head bows low;
To the prayers of His earthly children
That forever upward flow.
And the Lord in gladness hearkens,
To the prayer of praise and love,
That roots and branches here on earth,
And blooms in Heaven above.

Yes, the Lord bows low to listen
To the prayer of grief and pain,
When the heart is hurt and broken,
And the tears fall down like rain.
And the Lord gives heed in mercy
To the prayer of sin and shame
It was not to save the righteous;
But for sinners that He came.

Oh, the Lord with love doth listen
To the prayers that upward roll,
From the weary, worn and wretched,
That have naught beside the soul.
Now with blessings sweet He hears them,
And the joyful angels sing:
When the prayers of little children
Float upward, toward the King.

CHILDREN'S LOVE OF FLOWERS.

ONE of the most touching features of a summer experience at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, is the love of flowers, which seems to be universal among the little guests. By handfuls, armfuls, and lapfuls they gather them, and make chaplets, posies, and nosegays with a deftness that shows what a natural affinity exists between our little human rose-buds and the blossoms of the garden and field.

Mrs. Alice Morse Earle writes lovingly of early floral fancies. She says: "The dandelion was one of the earliest flowers to stir the children's memories, — memories which had lain dormant all winter; in New England it is 'the firstling of the year.' In the days of my childhood, we did not wait for the buttercups to open, to learn whether we 'loved butter;' the soft, dimpled chin of each child was held up, as had been those of other children of past decades, to catch the yellow reflection of the first dandelion.

"When the dandelion had lost her golden locks, and had grown old and gray, the children still plucked the downy heads, the 'clocks,' or snowballs, and holding them by the strong stems which bore aloft these airy seed-vessels, and fortifying the strong young lungs with a deep breath, they blew up the head 'to see whether my mother wants me,' or to learn the time o' the day.

"The ox-eye daisy, brought to New England by Endicott as a garden flower, soon followed the dandelion in bloom, and a fresh necklace could be strung from the starry blossoms, a daisy-chain. The daisy was also used as a medium of divination, by pulling from the floret the white ray-flowers, saying, 'He loves me, he loves me not.' Though the spring violets were dearly loved, we slaughtered them ruthlessly by 'fighting roosters' with them. The projecting spur under the curved stem at the base of the flower was a hook, and when the violets 'clinched' we pulled till the stronger was conqueror.

"There was a certain garden lore connected with insects, not so varied or extensive, probably, as a child would have upon a farm. We said to the snail,

Snail, snail, come out of your hole,
Or else I will beat you as black as a coal.

"We sang to the lady-bug,

Lady-bug, lady-bug fly away home;
Your house is on fire, your children will burn.

"We caught the grasshoppers and exhorted them,

Grandfather, grandfather gray,
Give me molasses, or I'll throw you away.

"And we sang some songs to the daddy-long-legs which memory has allowed to escape. We believed that earwigs lived for the sole purpose of penetrating our ears, that dragon-flies flew with the sole thought of sewing up our lips. To-day I remember these childish floral loves and rhymes of the country children."

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Congratulations.

THE mystery of the packing case was partly explained, when the ceremony of dedicating the new building took place. Before the dinner was put on the tables, and while the denizens of all the tenement houses in the district sat in waiting expectancy, Mr. Joy, who presided, announced that there would be a little music, as Mr. Drinkwater and his famous quartette were present, and had volunteered to assist in the dedication. Mr. Drinkwater came to the front, a tall man with a sunny face, a humorous twinkle in his eyes, and a high dome-like forehead which stretched back to his crown like the bare crag of some hoary mountain top. Pushing aside a screen, he pointed to a beautiful organ which it had hidden.

"Before we sing," he said, "I want to tell you about this organ, and how it comes to be here. I had some business yesterday at an organ-builder's in your city, and while I was there, I saw a gentleman whom I did not know, looking around the stock. Not being a very bashful man, I soon made his acquaintance, and in the course of the talk I mentioned incidentally that I was coming here this afternoon, and that I was expecting to help along a little with the music. He said that was curious, for he wanted to help along with the music here, too, and that it was that desire that brought him to the place. Finally it came out that he wanted to present the Mission with an organ, and I helped him to choose it. Here it is, and I do not know where there is a better one of its size in the State. That is all the story, except the giver's name, and that is my secret."

"We will get Mr. Drinkwater to give us the name," said Mr. Joy. "We want to know whom to thank for such a handsome gift."

"No, I am pledged," said Mr. Drinkwater. "I may say, however, that the gentleman said the gift was an expression of his esteem for a young lady whom some of you know. Her name is Alice Mapleton."

"Three cheers for Miss Alice," cried some one, and they were given with hearty good will.

Alice was blushing, but her face beamed with happiness, and she smilingly complied when Mr. Drinkwater beckoned her to come and take her seat at the organ. Then the singing began, and was kept up till the dinner was put on the table.

It was a novel, yet pleasant sight, to see the young ladies waiting on the rough-looking men and poorly-dressed women.

We need hardly say that the guests were enjoying themselves, as this dinner was the most costly and elaborate thing they had ever enjoyed in their lives.

Alice was very much puzzled about the organ. "Who could it be?" she said for the twentieth time as she and Louie walked down the room, when Louie stopped suddenly and exclaimed, "Oh, Alice! I believe I know; I do believe it was papa. I remember now that he asked me yesterday what sort of an organ we had. I told him that we had none as yet. And he has been hiding all the evening; I only found out a little [illegible] that he was here. If I was only sure, I do believe I would go and hug him right before all the people."

"Better wait till you get home, Louie. We must set an example of decorum. Now let us help to get things clear, for everyone seems to have finished."

By and by Mr. Joy's stentorian voice was heard, calling the meeting to order.

The quartette sang, "There's a Good T[illegible]."

"That song," said Mr. Joy, "would have been more appropriate if sung an hour or so ago, for the 'good time' arrived and is here. We are having a 'good time,' and we mean to keep it up to the end of the meeting. Now, I want you all to feel perfectly at home; this, remember, is not a charity affair. We are all friends, and we want each one to take part in dedicating this hall to religion, temperance, and progress.

"Mr. Jacobs has with wonderful generosity given it for the benefit of his tenants and their friends. Any society the object of which is the improvement of its members morally, mentally, or physically, will be welcome, and to such the hall will be free.

"This entertainment is given by some kind friends who are about to leave us; they have lived among us for a year or more, and they say we have been kind to them. I know they have been very kind to us. (Cries of "That's so.")

"We are sorry to lose them, but we cannot expect them to stay. They don't really belong to our sphere; but poverty came on them and drove them out of their own circle, and we had the benefit of their society for a time. Now they have recovered their property, they will resume the position which they had previously adorned. We shall not forget them, and we hope they will remember us and come and see us often in this, our beautiful new home. We owe the convenience of being able to invite them, indirectly to them. It was Miss Alice's efforts to be useful that suggested to Mr. Jacobs this means of helpfulness. You all know Mr. Jacobs, and are aware that he has built this place and furnished it at his own expense for our use. (Three cheers for Jacobs.) We mean to show him that we appreciate his kindness, by making a good use of it. There is nothing that will please him so much as to have it occupied every night, and in the day time, too. Now you understand the situation, and we will have some more music."

Mr. Graham who was seated next to Mr. Jacobs was in high spirits.

"You seem to feel pretty goot mine frien'," said the old man.

"Yes, my friend, I was thinking what a change it would make in this wicked world if all professing Christians were like these ladies, all ministers like Joy, and all money-lenders like Jacobs."

"Yes, mine frien', but then you and I would be out of business pretty quick."

"That's so," said the detective with a smile.

One song followed another and the people so evidently enjoyed the unwonted delight, that Mr. Joy looked ruefully at his programme. "Now," said he, as the cheering after one of the pieces subsided, "we want to hear from one or two of our friends. I have one here in charge of a detective who, I think, may have had some trouble in keeping him from escaping, so we will call on him first. Mr. Jacobs, we all want to thank you for this splendid gift to the people of your neighborhood. What have you to say for yourself?"

"There is nothing that I would wish to say, Mr. Chairman," said the good old Jew, speaking slowly and with unusual distinctness. "I did not know I was in custody, though mine frient Graham did sit by me and talk to me. Running away I did not think of, because I felt good to see every one happy. If I had known that I was expected to speak, I should have tried what I could do to slip oudt. But I need not speak much. You thank me—well, I thank you, too. I am happy in this thing, I do it to please myself, to please a young lady that I know, and I do it to help you all. You are Christians, I am a Jew. Well, we get along together. When I see a man drinking and his wife ragged and his children dirty and hungry, I am sorry and the Christian is sorry, too, if he is a good Christian. When we see him quit drinking and try to live better and brighten up, we are both glad. Well, there is no difference between us as to that. I notice that a man drinks more when he is dull and his home is miserable, and I find a certain young lady, a good frient of mine, has been trying to improve all this. I am glad and I say I wish success. Let me help, and so I have this place being built, and I help with that. Here is the place for anybody to come when he is dull and miserable. It is better than the saloon. Miss Alice and her frients will make it what it should be. I don't know how. But it is for you, and she will tell you how to use it. All old Jacobs wants in the way of thanks is that you make use of the place and that it shall be a help to you."

Mr. Joy had been beaming lovingly on the old man all the time he was speaking, and when he was going to his seat he stopped him, and taking his hand before them all, he said: "May the God of Israel, your God and our God, bless you abundantly for your good intentions, and reward you a hundred-fold for your gift. To your race we owe our Bible, and of your race our Lord came. You have been the spiritual teachers of the world for many generations, and we have repaid our obligations to you with scorn and ingratitude. But I venture to say that in this section the Jew will never be evil spoken of. In the presence of your friends I pray sincerely, may God bless you."

Then he consulted his programme and said: "We won't have any of these speeches. Let us hear from anybody who has any suggestion to make about this new enterprise, and how it should be conducted to be of the most use."

This invitation brought out a number of volunteers who each had thought of some good purpose that might be served by the new centre of neighborly feeling, and Mr. Joy made a note of these suggestions for the benefit of the committee. He read them all over to their authors and they were approved.

Just then a great, broad-shouldered, rough looking man, who wore a blue pea jacket with brass buttons, and a red handkerchief around his neck, asked if he might say a word.

"Certainly, my friend," said Mr. Joy, glad to hear from you."

"My name be Huggins," said the man, "I be English and I drives a truck and I be a roughish sort of a man. Well, my friend Wilkins, 'e drives a truck an' 'e be English too. One day, says 'e to me says 'e, 'Bill, the folks in our house be getting teetotal.'

"And says I to him, says I, 'it be a good thing for women and children and men as don't have to work hard, but chaps like you and me as has to be out in all kinds o' weather, we needs our beer,' says I.

"'Then,' says 'e to me, says 'e, 'Mebbe that's so, but I notices the kids be looking better and the women more fixed up than ours be, and I be afeered we aint keeping up wid the percession.'

"Then says I to 'im, says I, 'What be you driving at, Jack?'

"And says 'e, 'suppose we tries it a week, Bill, and see how it goes?'

"'Tries what,' says I.

"'The teetotal,' says 'e.

"Then says I, 'if you can stand it, I can.'

"And says 'e, 'it's a go.' So we shook 'ands on it, and we've stuck to it.

"It was toughish at first, but when I gave my ol' woman my wages on Saturday night I felt better, for says she, 'Is this all for me?'

"And says I, 'Yes.'

"And says she, 'Oh, Bill, it's so good of you, now Susie can go to school again where she aint been for two weeks on account of having no shoes.'

"Then says I to myself, says I, 'Bill, aint you ashamed of yourself, 'ere you've a been swallowing down boots and dresses as your children needed, and a keeping learning out of their heads so as you might guzzle down beer yourself, that don't do you no good. You be a hog,' says I, 'and be ent you ashamed of yourself?' And says I to myself, 'I be.'

"Then on Sunday I sees Jack and says I, 'How goes it old 'fellow?'

"And says 'e to me, 'I tell you, Bill, I've 'ad the best dinner to-day we've 'ad in our 'ouse for a long time, and my wife and the youngsters begin to look better already. She thinks I've 'ad a big rise in wages, and says she, "this week has been like when we was just married 'cause we aint had a row," so I be going to stick to it. What say you?'

"And says I, 'since the ladies has been so kind as to invite us to the big dinner, suppose we go and just out with it before the hull crowd and sign for good.'

"And says 'e, 'if thou'll do the taking I'll be with you and back you up.'

"So, ladies, if you will take two [illegible] fellows on your pledge book, we'll be [illegible] glad to sign it."

"And we shall be delighted to [illegible] you," said Alice.

While Mr. Huggins was speaking [illegible] wife, after her first look of surprise, [illegible] to exchange nods with Mrs. Wilkins. Then Mrs. Wilkins began to clap [illegible] hands, and Mrs. Huggins to cry.

Mr. Joy rose, and with his usual [illegible] inary shout of 'Glory,' said: "That [illegible] best speech I have heard in a long [illegible]. When a man feels that he is doing [illegible] and would like to do better, but keep [illegible] feelings to himself, the devil is not [illegible] afraid, but says to himself, 'I must [illegible] him a little and perhaps change the [illegible], and he will be all right in a few da[illegible] has not the courage to break away [illegible] when a man has the courage to sta[illegible] before his fellow-men and say, 'I [illegible] the wrong and want to be right,' th[illegible] devil gets frightened and jerks th[illegible], but it's too late, the victim is off th[illegible] and escaped. You felt him jerking a[illegible] appetite all the week, I have no doul[illegible] you were almost drawn into the salo[illegible]"

Here the quartette struck up: "[illegible] de middle of de King's highway."

A very touching address was pre[illegible] to Mrs. Mapleton and her daughter, [illegible] working people of the neighborhood.

When Mrs. Mapleton arose to [illegible], there were shouts of applause. She [illegible]:

"I am not accustomed to [illegible] speeches in public. All I can say in [illegible] to your kind words is, that I si[illegible] thank you not only for them, but [illegible] your kindness to my daughter and [illegible] while we have been living among [illegible] carry away with me a treasure I [illegible] own when I came, and which I migh[illegible] have had, if I had not been brough[illegible] the peace of God. That is worth in[illegible] more than I lost. I know its value [illegible] learned it among you. That will m[illegible] experience in this neighborhood [illegible] memory to me as long as I live."

Mrs. Mapleton sat down amid sh[illegible] of applause, some of the women were [illegible], and the dedication closed with a [illegible] song from the quartette.

"It has been one of the happiest [illegible] of my life," said Mrs. Mapleton.

"Vell, I tink it vas a goot day' bees-ness, for I felt petter as if I make a [illegible] dollars," said Mr. Jacobs.

"I never was so tired since th[illegible] was born, and yet I'd like to beg it [illegible] over again," said Mrs. Callaghan.

"We have had a blessed go[illegible] while casting our bread upon the [illegible] now, if we are to have another goo[illegible] and perhaps many, when it returns [illegible] many days," then I think with [illegible] Jacobs, that we have done a good da[illegible] business, and I pray that you who ha[illegible] such noble work to-day, may in [illegible] lose your reward," said Mr. Joy.

Someone sang in a deep, rich [illegible] "Praise God from whom all [illegible] flow," and looking around they [illegible] Mr. Drinkwater's bald head on the o[illegible] of the group and knew whose voice it was.

"I feel very well satisfied with [illegible] ginning," said Alice, "and so I [illegible] think that it is only the beginnin[illegible] good results that are to follow yo[illegible] and good act, Mr. Jacobs, but I d[illegible] knew about that organ, I shall [illegible] until I find out who the generous g[illegible]."

"Why not employ a detecti[illegible] Mapleton," asked Mr. Graham, [illegible] smile.

"Oh, I never thought of that, [illegible] Graham you are just the man."

"I went into the basement and f[illegible] case in which it came," said the c[illegible] "A card was tacked on it, on wh[illegible] written the name of the hall when it was to be left. I removed the card an[illegible] on the other side the business [illegible] well-known merchant, and that it [illegible] be lost, I will present it to his da[illegible] and he handed the card to Louie, [illegible] aloud as far as—"John Wilson, In[illegible]—and then she clapped her hands, [illegible]ing, "Now, was I not right, Ali[illegible] sure it was from him, and I am [illegible] that it was."

"So you had a suspicion as to [illegible] son," said Mr. Graham; "well I [illegible] of that as I have done a very [illegible] sional thing, I will give you the c[illegible] let you bear the responsibility," [illegible] all went off laughing.

HOW A MISSIONARY DIES.

In a letter to the "Church at Home and Abroad," Mr. M. N. Kerr supplements the brief news of the death of Dr. Good, so long the devoted missionary at Batanga, Western Africa. Mr. Kerr was with him when he died, and he gives a pathetic account of his last hours. At times he lost his mind and seemed to be wandering. Efforts to bring down the temperature by cold baths were only partially successful. After one of them, however, his mind became quite clear, and he realized that he was dying, and gave a message for his wife and son. He begged us most earnestly to push on without fear in the development of the interior stations. He was out exploring the country for a suitable site when he was attacked by the fever which proved fatal. A short time before his death, his mind was specially clear for a few moments. He prayed most earnestly for our mission work, for those of us remaining here and for additional missionaries to man the stations. He closed with a few words of supplication on his own behalf, that he might be prepared for his coming change. No more self-forgetful prayer could have been offered. We, who stood by his bedside, were deeply moved.

The day after Dr. Good's death, hundreds of people came to the station to express their sympathy. They were not moved by mere idle curiosity, but the tears in many eyes revealed that their hearts were touched.

He was buried on the hill at Efulen overlooking the villages for which he labored and prayed. His coffin, made by Mr. Kerr, was carried by representative men of surrounding tribes.

THE FOLLY OF REVENGE.

The Arabians have a quaint old story that has a noble lesson in it. A haughty favorite of an Oriental monarch, who was passing along the highway—so runs the story—threw a stone at a poor dervish or priest. The dervish did not dare to throw it back at the man who had assaulted him, for he knew the favorite was very powerful. So he picked up the stone and put it carefully in his pocket, saying to himself, "The time for revenge will come by and by, and then I will repay him for it." Not long afterward, the dervish saw a crowd coming toward him. He hastened to see what was the matter, and found to his astonishment that his enemy, the favorite, who had fallen in disgrace with the king, was being paraded through the principal streets on a camel, exposed to the jests and insults of the populace. The dervish, seeing all this, hastily grasped at the stone in his pocket. But, after considering a moment, he threw the stone away, saying, "The time for revenge never comes; for if our enemy is powerful, revenge is dangerous as well as foolish; and if he is weak and wretched, then revenge is worse than foolish, it is mean and cruel."

A Stitch in Time

Saves nine, says the old proverb, and it is equally true that a little of the right medicine in the Spring or when the first symptoms of trouble appear, will prevent long illness.

Mr. J. F. Wassel, printer and publisher, at Dwight, Ill., says: "I neglected what seemed to be slight ailment until I became so broken down from rhumatism that I had to give up my work and became an invalid. I yielded to my wife's proposition to take Hood's Sarsaparilla. I used two bottles and have entirely recovered my wonted strength and activity. I now put in full time at my office and enjoy life like a newly made man. My wife says did it and insisted on my writing this letter of gratitude in acknowledgment of the same." Be sure to get Hood's.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON

QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—IN COMPOUNDING, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. TRIUMPH OVER TROUBLE.*

THERE is no power even in disgrace, in prisons, or bondage, or punishment of any sort, to give one trouble, if one is mastered by a great devotion to a noble purpose. There is no power in death, even though it come cruelly and harshly, to destroy this peace. Stephen in the hour of death had the face of an angel, and had comforting visions of his ascended Lord. The stones of the mob, and even the gnashing on him of their teeth, had no power to shut out the glories revealed to him.

On January 10th, 1860, the Pemberton mill, a large cotton factory at Lawrence, Mass., suddenly fell into ruins, burying the operatives in the debris. Some were rescued alive; others would have been, but a broken lantern set the ruins on fire and the rescuers were driven from their work. As they turned away, they distinctly heard some imprisoned girls who had been brought up in the Sunday School singing that precious hymn of William Hunter's,

My heavenly home is bright and fair.

And up from the flaming jaws of death there came the brave chorus,

I'm going home to die no more.

No, we may be sure we carry the source of trouble in our own hearts. Many a man on a throne has been troubled with the bitterest, sorest trouble that man can know. Wise men like Solomon have, in spite of their intelligence and their wisdom, been full of the keenest anguish and trouble. Rich men who lived in palaces, who could fly to the ends of the earth to find enjoyment, and gather luxuries from every clime, have yet committed suicide trying to escape their troubles. Brilliant men, having the ear of the world, poets, orators, statesmen, leaders of great armies, have been mastered by their passions and their lusts, and have fallen like Lucifer from heaven, ending their days in drunkenness and debauch and shame, wallowing in trouble. No, indeed; trouble does not come from things outside of us, but from what is within us. And if you want to give a man peace and cure his trouble, then you must change his heart.

A lady who had passed through the terrors of the Vicksburg siege and had had the awful din of bursting shells and the roar of cannon and turmoil of war ringing in her ears for weeks, wrote to a friend the night after the surrender: "Silence and night are once more united. It seems to me I can hear the silence and feel it, too. It wraps me like a soft garment; how else can I express this peace?" So a man who has been in the midst of the turmoil of passions, who has had the din of rebuking conscience ringing in his ears with warnings and threatenings, who has known regret and remorse, who has heard the roaring of the evil one as he came every day nearer, seeking to devour him, who has sought to do good and yet been led to do evil, when he finally gives over the struggle and surrenders his will and his heart to the Lord Jesus Christ, when his sins are forgiven, his passions are curbed, his heart is cleansed and purified, his conscience is void of offense toward God and men—oh, the blessed peace that wraps that soul about like a soft garment!

when only the consciousness that you are a poor sinner saved by divine grace will give you peace. Dr. Cuyler says that when the richest man who has died in New York within his memory was on his dying bed, he asked his attendants to sing for him. They sang the old familiar revival hymn, "Come, ye sinners, poor and needy." The dying millionaire said to them, in a plaintive tone, "Yes, please sing that again for me. I am poor and needy." Ah! what could fifty millions of railway securities and bank stocks do for him on the verge of eternity?

MY GOD.‡

DEAR Lord, my Guide and Leader be;
I do not turn my face from Thee.

I am His child, He is my God,
And ever will He be my Lord.

I lie at rest upon His arm,
He'll keep me ever safe from harm.

He makes the day, He makes the night,
And does it all as He thinks right.

His face is fair, His garments shine;
Sinner, He wants that heart of thine.

He tries His children all to bless,
He gives them sleep and gives them rest.

He makes the sun and moon to shine,
He does all this, this God of mine.

Money Made In One Half Minute.

I have not made less than $16.00 any day since I began selling the Centrifugal Ice Cream Freezers. It is such a wonder. I always have a crowd wanting ice cream. I make from $5.00 to $8.00 a day selling ice cream and from $2.00 to $10.00 a day selling freezers. I can freeze cream elegantly in one half minute and that astonishes people so they all want to sample the cream and then many of them buy freezers as the cream is smooth and contains no lumps. Every freezer is guaranteed to freeze the cream in one half minute. Anyone can sell ice cream and the freezer sells itself. My sister is making from $10.00 to $15.00 a day. Write to W. H. Baird & Co., Sta. A., Pittsburg, Pa., and they will mail you circulars and full particulars free so anyone can go right to work and make lots of money all summer.

A SURPRISED PROFESSOR.

ev. Professor Medley, a distinguished dine, recently related the following incidit: "A short time ago I paid a visit to a aged Christian woman whose life-story I now something of. From ten years old to eventy there had been a perpetual strugg Nothing had she ever known of comf, elegance, luxury; but she had known wi a knowledge deeper than many of us, Jus Christ. I went to see her with some vion of saying a few comforting words. B how grandly did she turn the tables un me! Comfort her! She needed nie of my consolation. Something or o'er in our interview unlocked her heart a unloosened her lips, and she told me, inbrief, the story of her life—a story of mk triumph, mercy, and goodness. I le her rejoicing and thanking God.

If we are in want of 'aids to faith,' and ca find no help in our own poor lives, let us leave our elaborate discussions, our apogetic lectures, our fearfully and wondoully constructed explanations of all things, and visit some home where lives a sc that has taken Christ at his word. All sch ennobled lives, brightened by the p ence of Christ amid the shadow and tri, will ever be found the clearest and mt unanswerable evidence of that peace wch the world cannot give."

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

Traditional Site of the Mansion of Dives In Jerusalem—The Lesson of the Saviour's Beautiful Parable.

PASSING along the streets of the Holy City, the traveler is interested in many places that are indicated as the authentic scenes of events prominently associated with Bible history. Unquestionably, many are genuine, as the sites have either been identified by means of inscriptions or other evidence. As to the Temple, Hezekiah's Pool, the ancient gates, Mounts Zion and Moriah, the Tomb of Absalom, Gethsemane, Hinnom, the Citadel or Tower of David and many other places within and without the walls, there is practically no dispute. There are others, however—and their number is by no means small—that lack essential proofs to establish their claim to genuineness, and whose identification is done largely in response to the mercenary desire of monks, dragomen and guides to gratify the curiosity of sight-seers and credulous pilgrims, who are only too willing to accept such facts as true. Indeed, so many doubtful "identifications" are presented to the stranger in Jerusalem that it is only with extreme difficulty and after careful inquiry that he is able to discriminate intelligently between the spurious and the true. When it is remembered that the structures of modern Jerusalem overlie the accumulated debris of eighteen hundred years, and that the city of our Saviour's day is from fifty to eighty feet beneath the surface, one cannot do otherwise than doubt many of the identifications and traditions that are so conveniently ready, and which invest almost every street-corner in modern Jerusalem with a history that reaches back beyond the time when the Romans left not a single building standing within the walls.
